Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the reason I ask to have that amendment adopted is this: Not only does this section put into the hands of the Philippine Government that is now to be instituted under this bill the government of the non-Christian tribes, not only does it provide that they shall be represented in this section by representatives appointed by the governor general, but it expressly provides that the legislature of the Philippine Islands may modify, amend, or repeal any provision of this section. In other words, it gives with one hand the power of representation, and on the other hand it withholds it whenever the Philippine Assembly may desire to do so. In other words, it allows the Philippine Assembly at its first meeting to pass a law under which the non-Christian population shall not be represented or to modify the representation in any way it desires. In other words, it leaves the government of the non-Christian territory and the non-Christian tribes exclusively in the hands of the Filipinos. The gentleman says that the Philippine Assembly is well qualified to take care of non-Christian tribes; that the Filipino people are more liberal than the Americans. The gentleman wou'd really, I presume, cause the committee to believe, if he could, that there was no necessity in behalf of the non-Christian tribes for increasing the appropriations from year to year. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that fact is one of the reasons why these amendments ought to be adopted—that they have just begun the civilization of the non-Christian tribes. If anything is done such as it demanded, it will, of course, necessitate increasing expenditures from time to time.

The gentleman makes a great virtue of such action. They could do no less if they were doing anything like their duty. And it is not that. I do not charge that the Filipinos will not do what they think their duty is. I believe, though, that it is unwise to put this responsibility upon them now, this great problem, for it will be one; and I believe when it is thoroughly understood by the non-Christian tribes themselves that they are no longer subject to the immediate government of the Americans, there will be difficulty throughout all that territory. The present governor general of the Moros is an American. He stands there representing to them the American Government. In my judgment he is, perhaps, the wisest and best man that could be appointed for such place. In my judgment if he can not succeed in the civil government of the Moros, no man can succeed. But his place will be taken when this bill becomes a law, and whatever government will of necessity be established there will not be to them the Government of America as it is now; it will be the government of the Filipinos, which they so much dislike and which they so much fear. That is the danger, Mr. Chairman, in the situation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the Committee on Insular Affairs in framing this bill was to give to the Filipinos the most autonomous form of government that could be framed. The majority members of the committee infinitely regret that they have not been able to frame a bill that meets the approval of all of the leaders on the other side of the House. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] does not at all agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the leader of that side of the House, as to some of the provisions of this bill. The gentleman from Illinois stated that the only objection he had to the governmental features of this bill was that they were too illiberal. He said he wanted to extend to the Filipinos the fullest measure of self-government possible in order that they might demonstrate whether or not they were fit for self-government. The gentleman from Iowa thinks that we go too far, and that this bill ought to be so modified as not to permit the Philippine Legislature to change the provisions of this section. I do not agree with the gentleman from Iowa. Neither am I willing to go as far as the gentleman from Illinois professes to desire to go. I occupy a middle and, I hope, a more consistent ground than either of these gentlemen.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES. I believe that as to all questions relating to redistricting the islands and the apportionment of members for the legislature—the senate as well as the house of representatives—we can safely leave them to the Philippine Legislature.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. Has he changed his mind from what it was a year ago when he introduced the first Jones bill? The bill provided a much larger measure of self-government to the islands, provided for independence absolutely at a time fixed, and yet now this bill does much less in granting power to the Filipinos and says not one word about fixing the time for independence.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, my answer is that I have stated more than once during the course of this debate that this bill did not fully represent my individual ideas as to Philippine independence. Personally I would prefer to fix in this bill, as in the former one, a definite date for Philippine independence. I believe that in the course of five or six years from now—and that bill provided for a probationary government to last for eight years—that the Filipinos will be entirely prepared to establish and maintain a government of their own. But, as I have said before, there are gentlemen of my own party who think that it is not best to fix a definite date for independence, and their opinions have weight with me. And I bow, and I bow gracefully, Mr. Chairman, to the dictates of my party upon this subject as expressed in the national Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman think this corresponds with the declaration of the great Democratic Party in the Baltimore platform?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. MILLER. What about neutralization?

Mr. JONES. Well, I will say to the gentleman that I can easily anticipate what he is going to say. I believe that an effort should be made to neutralize the islands, but I do not believe that that proposition should find a place in this bill, and I will say further to the gentleman that when the time comes, if it ever does, when it is possible to secure such neutralization an earnest effort will be made to do it. But the gentleman must realize that conditions in Europe are such to-day that it would be futile to attempt it at this time. The Democrats will bring forward a resolution when the time comes, having for its object the neutralization of the Philippines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more in which to answer a question which I wish to propound to him.

Mr. JONES. I am perfectly willing to answer the gentleman's question if I can, but my time has expired.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman may have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Has not the question of the neutralization of the islands just as much a place in this bill as a declaration of our intent that we propose to give the islands their independence?

Mr. JONES. Not a bit of it. The gentleman does not wish to insert in the preamble of this bill a neutralization proposition, I think.

Mr. MILLER. I do not want any preamble in the bill at all. You have seen fit to put one in. Why not put the other in?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman wishes a neutralization measure incorporated in the body of this bill. To that I can not agree. There is no place in this bill for such a proposition. It must be a separate and independent measure.

Mr. MILLER. I am delighted that the gentleman has made such a splendid argument against his own preamble.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, by striking out, in line 9, page 12, after the word "district," all the remainder of the paragraph down to line 23, to the colon before the word "Provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 12, by striking out all of page 12 after the word "district," in line 9, down to and including the word "Assembly," in line 23.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that. The first part of that has gone out. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] offered an amendment covering that, and the first part of that has gone out.

Mr. MILLER. Then my amendment is perfectly proper.

Mr. JONES. You want to strike out, then, the amendment to this section which was adopted by practically unanimous consent. That section has been amended now, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota, Does his motion commence in line 9?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; line 9, after the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. That sentence might be considered separately in a motion, I will say; but it would not do to strike out the next sentence, because that would include the sentence that has been amended, and the amendment has been agreed upon.

Mr. MILLER. Did that amendment begin in line 19?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out after the word "district." in line 9, page 12, the remainder down to and including the word "district," in line 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 12, by striking out, after the word "district," in line 9, down to and including the word "district," in line 13.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the difficulty that the majority Members of the Committee were in when trying to frame some legislation that would give an appearance of looking after the interests of the non-Christian tribes, but I am not exactly in agreement with them in the idea that they have hit upon a happy solution. I think it is absolutely ludicrous. Opinions, of course, may differ, but that is the way it seems to me.

Let us see what this does. You propose to organize one senate district. That senate district would stretch over and touch almost every island in the whole archipelago; just where, we do not know. The territorial limits in the islands are not defined with accuracy in many places. There are two general classes of non-Christian territory, some that are purely non-Christian and some that are quasi Christian, like Nueva, Viscaya, Palawan, and Mindoro. This makes one district for a thousand different places. I do not know, when a man is appointed, if he can ever find out just what his territory and district is. There are to be nine representatives. I suppose they could be so arranged that they would comprehend possibly most of the non-Christian territory. But it is going to be very dubious and difficult to locate those districts. But let us waive that, just to be good natured to-day. Is this a representative government? Oh, what a farce to put a provision like that in a bill and have it labeled "autonomy and self-government"!

Whom are these people representing? The answer will come back, "The non-Christian tribes." The chances are ten to one that the man appointed will never have seen the district or people that he represents. He knows nothing whatever about them. Representative government! Having the Governor General appoint two senators and nine representatives to represent some people that they do not know and have never seen!

Mr. HELM. Is not that what they have been getting?

Mr. MILLER. Oh, it is entirely different. I am perfectly frank to say that I believe in a change in the system that is now or has been heretofore in vogue in the islands, but this does not reach the situation. Not only is that true, but you are appointing new men. They are to be Filipinos, of course. I can just see the majority members of this committee shrivelling up their souls in holy horror at the thought of Americans sitting in the Filipino Legislature to represent these non-Christian people. I would not be in favor of that myself. But if you are going to have such a left-handed corkscrew system as that, by all means appoint Filipinos to it. But you can never escape the fact that when you appoint a Tagalo or a Viscayan or a Pangasinan or an Ilocano or a Bicol or a Cagayanese or a Zambalan to represent a Moro you are doing the same thing as though you to-day appointed a Frenchman to represent a constituency of Germans in a parliament. You would be appointing a man who would not at this hour dare to go to see his people, and I know whereof I speak.

But let us not dwell so much upon the Moros. Should you appoint an Ilocano to represent an Ifugao and tell him he had to go and consult with his constituent, that consultation would be short and interesting, and there are 125,000 Ifugaos. The same would be true of the Bontocs, the Kalingas, the Apayaos, or the Benguets, or the people inhabiting Lepanto.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I should like three minutes more. I should like to complete this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Now, I can see that the committee were up against a very difficult situation, and possibly in the extremity of their dilemma finally wrote this language into the bill. I am not surprised that no one of them has been able to stand on this floor and justify it. It permits of no justification. If the people whom you call non-Christian are not capable of self-government or participating in self-government, then shape your government so they will not, but do not go through the farce of putting into a bill the shadow of representation. Why, I am reliably informed that the present secretary of the interior recently said in an interview, which has been widely published—and he has not denied it—that he was in favor of giving the right of the franchise to the Tagbanuas. They live on the island of Palawan, and are among the wildest people to be found in the islands. I do not mean by that the most vicious or cruel, but they are among the wildest people to be found in the islands, with no more comprehension of voting than a Hottentot who had never seen a white man in his life. The idea is utterly ridiculous and nonsensical. The unfortunate part of it is that the present secretary of the interior happens to be the man in charge of the region. When he goes there and sees his people he will change his mind.

There is another element in this, Mr. Chairman, that I am astounded that democracy should champion. I have always understood that democracy stood for the freedom and the liberty of the individual and for the complete autonomy of each locality, for the divorce and separation of tyrannical power from the power of the people. But what have you here? You are permitting the Governor General to name two senators, his own personal friends, his henchmen, his dog Fido, and his dog Towzer, and nine representatives to sit in the legislative body, to influence legislation there, and they are the hands of the Executive and not the legislative branch at all. Did you ever hear of such a scheme of government as that? I know the chairman stated a fact when he said that he knows the vice governor general, Mr. Gilbert, liked this proposition. I will tell you why. He liked it because he saw that it would strengthen the hands of the Governor General, and for that reason alone. It will give him tremendous power and strength in the legislative branch, and here you are turning your backs upon the wisdom of your fathers, forsaking for all time the logic of your own minds, abandoning the experience of humanity, and thrusting the tyranny of the Executive upon the power of the representatives of the people in the legislative assembly.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, it has been so long since I left college, so long since I studied Latin, that I hesitate to make use of Latin words. I believe the itch for writing is described in Latin as a case of cacoethes scribendi. I would therefore describe the disease with which the gentleman from Minnesota is afflicted as cacoethes alteratus, which I take to mean an itch for offering amendments. [Laughter.]

Mr. HELM. Let us have those words taken down. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have those words translated. I do not know whether I have been complimented or abused, and I think I have a right to know.

Mr. JONES. My translation of them is "an itch for offering amendments."

Mr. MILLER. Is that the translation of the gentleman's Latin?

Mr. JONES. My Latin may be bad, but if my translation of it is correct, then it correctly describes the disease with which the gentleman is badly afflicted.

Mr. MILLER. I think the gentleman's Latin was good, but his pronunciation was atrocious.

Mr. JONES. I do not think there is anything wrong about my translation.

Mr. MILLER. If I have anything of the kind described by the gentleman, I do not know where I caught it; but I have just been over on the Democratic side for the first time since I have been in this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has correctly said that the government of the wild tribes in the Philippines presents a very difficult problem. We all concede that, but I want to assure the House that this proposition has received more careful consideration at the hands of the committee than perhaps any other, possibly all others in the bill together. It is the desire of the committee to provide the very best government that is practicable for the people of the wild tribes. We all realize that they are not capable, as are the inhabitants of the civilized and Christianized Provinces, to elect their officials.

The situation in the Philippines is a peculiar one, and it has to be dealt with according to the conditions which surround it. The committee have felt that the wild tribes ought to have representation in the legislature, and since it would be farcical to permit them to elect their representatives we decided that the very best that could possibly be done to protect their interests would be to have the Governor General appoint their representatives. This will certainly insure their being represented by men of character and ability who will understand their needs. The gentleman says they are willing to trust the Americans, and therefore I have no doubt but that they are willing to trust the American Governor General to appoint their representatives. I can not conceive of any better plan than that; and I want to say to the gentleman, who seems to be having some trouble with framing his amendment, that even if it were adopted it would leave the subject in a most unfortunate situation. It would strike out the provision which provides for dividing certain territory into one senatorial and nine representative districts, but would still impose upon the Governor General the responsibility and duty of appointing two senators and nine representatives.

Mr. MILLER. If the chairman of the committee will accept this amendment, I will offer one later to correct that difficulty.

Mr. JONES. It was not my intention to help the gentleman perfect his amendment, but just to call attention to the fact that if it were adopted it would leave the bill in an unfortunate situation.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Whatever might be our impression as to Philippine independence and local self-government, whether immediate or deferred, I think there is not a Member on either side that does not recognize that this non-Christian problem is the most delicate question we will have to consider. The committee in its consideration recognized that. There are two separate clauses which suggest the seriousness of the situation. I am quite certain that if you read these two provisions in the bill that you will find there is going to be a conflict here. The attempt to meet the Moro situation has resulted in a possible conflict of authority in the bill.

The delicacy of this situation is suggested in lines 16 to 23, which places legislative authority in the Governor General, through appointment, by making a special provision that is not found in other parts of the islands where the Philippine Assembly is wholly in control. The assembly thus constituted will be partly elective and partly appointive. That indicates that the non-Christian tribes really make a delicate situation in the government over there, which ought not to be too readily surrendered to a people not well disciplined in government. Then, on page 20, to which our attention was called awhile ago by the chairman, there is another provision which suggests the same thing. By this clause there is to be established by the Philippine Legislature a bureau which is to have full control of the interests of these non-Christian sections. This bureau is a creature of the Philippine Legislature, while the representatives of these non-Christian people are creatures of the Governor General. Allegiance is to different authorities.

Now, the conflict I see in the bill that we had up before is that in the one case the representatives of the non-Christian tribes are to be appointed by the Governor General. There will be 9 of them, and that will be one-tenth of the legislature if there are 90 members, or not quite one-tenth of the whole, as the bill provides for 90 members from the Christian and 9 members from the non-Christian sections. The 9 are appointed by the Governor General and have the right to speak, to vote, and to hold office—in a word, the same right of any other member elected. The legislature is thus composed of elective and appointive members with the same rights in the body.

Then, on the other hand, there is to be a bureau created by the Philippine Legislature, and that bureau is to have full control of matters pertaining to the non-Christian tribes. In the first place, you will have nine members appointed by the Governor General to have a position in the legislature, and on the other hand we have here a bureau created by the Philippine Legislature to have full control.

Mr. JONES. Not to have full control. The bureau does not have any legislative authority; its authority is purely ministerial. There are some 23 or more bureaus there now through which the affairs that have been placed under these bureaus are administered. The legislature legislates as to these bureaus and the matters that pertain to them pass through the bureau.

Mr. FESS. The bill says:

And shall have general supervision over the public affairs of the inhabitants of the territory represented in the legislature by appointive senators and representatives.

Mr. JONES. That language is put in there advisedly. The secretary of the interior had the same authority, but he was subject, of course, to the laws prescribed by the commission.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, it is not clear yet in my mind that there may not be a conflict here, because the source of authority in the one place is elective and in the other it is appointive.

Mr. JONES. That difficulty suggested itself to my mind in the beginning, but I consulted with the officials in the War Department and this language was supposed to be the language which would best cover the situation.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the probabilities are that what was intended was to convey in the appointment of the bureau administrative power only, leaving the legislative power in the hands of the appointees of the government.

Mr. JONES. That was unquestionably the intention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the principle of giving appointive offices legislative functions, I think, is more or less to be criticized. For example, we are to have nine members appointed by the Governor General without the consent on the part of the senate or any other body. They are to be given legislative functions. I fear we are going too fast in this legislation. I think it would be safer for us to still retain the authority over the non-Christian tribes in the government here rather than to put it over entirely into the hands of the Philippine Legislature. That is the serious question that we are discussing. I believe that if our concern is to move safely that we are going a little too rapidly here; that while the Philippine Legislature would like to exercise full control over the non-Christian tribes, it would be safer for all concerned if we would retain that authority until we can see how the present bill will work, which passes over to the Filipinos the senate as well as the house of representatives.

Therefore the question in my mind is, Is it better for all concerned, the Filipino as well as the non-Christian peoples, to give the control of the non-Christian tribes into the hands of the Philippine Legislature, or would it be better for us to retain the supervision over the non-Christian tribes until we see the progress in the Philippine Legislature on these matters that pass through their hands? That is the chief question that arises here. It seems to me that we are going too rapidly, and I am fearful of the effects of it.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think that one of the errors that the gentlemen on the Republican side of the House make in the consideration of this bill is the assumption that the Filipinos are not a vigorous nation or race of people capable of the very highest standards of development. You charge up to the Filipino people and hold them responsible for all of the shortcomings of the Spanish régime. Self-government was denied the Filipinos by the Spanish people, yet you charge up their failure to develop into a world-power as a liability of the Filipino people, when they were in subjection, and did not have the control or management of their own Government. We know enough to know what usually follows, and always has followed, in the wake of Spanish control. In the next place you charge up against the Filipino people all of the shortcomings of the American carpetbag government. These several and different commissions that the United States Government has had there undertaking to administer the affairs of the Philippine Islands——

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HELM. Just one moment. Everywhere those commissions have fallen down, and the thing I particularly have in mind is the question of slavery that has existed there ever since the American commission took control; if it is the fault of anybody, it is just as much the fault of the American commission as the fault of anyone else, and more so because the commission went right back to the fountainhead of authority, and it ought to have and could have acquired the necessary power to suppress the evil that the gentleman has complained of.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Just for a question.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman refers to the evils of the American carpetbag government. Does the gentleman mean to state that the American government over there has been productive of evil rather than good?

Mr. HELM. I am not undertaking to say that the American administration in the Philippine Islands has been a total and abject failure. It has been in large manner a success.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman says we charged up to the Filipinos——

Mr. HELM. Yes; whatever has gone wrong. The American administration has not been responsible for anything that has gone wrong, but you contend that the Filipinos are responsible, although they did not administer the government in which they had no control, still every failure is charged up against them. The whole object and purpose of this bill is to give the Filipino people a chance to exercise government. The supreme goal in all this undertaking is Philippine independence. That is what they are contending for, and when this bill becomes a law every incentive, every motive on the part of the Filipino people will be to make good, to show their capacity not only to administer and control the affairs of the Christian tribes, but they will say, "You have given us authority to participate in the administration of the government of the people whom the American people believe are hostile to us, and we are going to show you our capacity and ability to deal successfully with that responsibility."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] made a remark a little while ago that was of considerable interest to me. It seems our colleague from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] referred to the government in the Philippine Islands as a "carpetbag government." The gentleman from Ohio seemed to resent the term, and countered by asking the gentleman from Kentucky if he meant to charge that no good thing could be done by a carpetbag government; that is, as he put it, had no good thing been done by the alien government which we have forced on the Philippine people? Mr. Chairman, I say very frankly to him that I think we have done a good many excellent things in the Philippines, but it does not get rid of the fact that it is a carpetbag government, that it is an alien government, and that it is there without the consent of the people who are being governed. The people there are hostile to it, and, in my judgment, properly hostile to it, because no carpetbag government can ever be a satisfactory one to any people. Fortunately, I was quite young during the carpetbag and reconstruction era in the South, but I remember enough of that nightmare to have had it impressed on my mind so firmly that if I lived to be a thousand years old I would never forget it. All that was possibly hateful in connection with government of our people, over whom those carpetbaggers came to rule, to tyrannize, and to persecute in a political way, was done, and the gentleman's anxiety for the recognition of literacy in government the other day was conspicuously absent at that particular time. I do not want to try to force upon any people on earth the sort of government which I would not consent to have forced upon me. There is a maxim of conduct which I commend to the attention of every man in the consideration of this matter—do unto others as you would have them do unto you.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the scope and purpose of this bill is the very best thing that could be constructed for the benefit of the Filipino people. If this committee is interested with reference to these people in one thing more than another, it is in establishing that sort of relation between the American Government and the Filipino people as will give them the largest possible power to administer their own affairs. I believe that in this bill we are getting away from the bureaucratic government about which my friend from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] complains so bitterly and which was exercised under the American commission. The very fact that the administration of the government by the American commission resulted in giving the Filipino people no voice whatever is one of the sources that led us to the proposition of giving them a larger autonomy. The gentleman from Minnesota says that the appointment of two senators and nine representatives will give the Governor General autocratic power and there will be bureaucratic administration of government, which it is not our intention to give, where we are attempting to establish a reprerentative government. That is true to a certain extent, but another thing is also true, that it is incumbent upon us as a legislative body to exercise the utmost good faith with a people for whom we are attempting to legislate. My friend from Minnesota remembers very distinctly, no doubt, that in 1905 we made a provision for a legislative assembly in the Philippines, but when we did that we absolutely retained the veto power in the Philippine Commission, and when that legislature had been elected and it was known that within 60 days it would convene for the purpose of legislating for the Filipino people, the American commission within 10 days, before the meeting of the legislative body convened, passed 70 statutes in 10 days, covering all of the probable subjects that would be legislated upon by the Filipino—taking it out of the hands of the legislature that was elected by the people to legislate upon those subjects, and when they did legislate, made their legislation absolutely secure, so far as control was concerned, in the hands of the commission.

Of course there is no bureaucracy in that the gentleman will contend. Of course there was no bureaucracy in their taking out of the hands of the legally constituted body elected for that purpose not only the right but the power to say what kind of legislation they wanted enacted; and in the fact of that historic fact, Mr. Chairman, it ill becomes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] to criticize this bill on the theory of its creating a bureaucratic form of government in the hands of the Governor General. I submit that, so far as the non-Christian people are concerned, that there is a wide difference between a legislative body that is constituted by the two senators and nine representatives and a bureau that is constituted to administer whatever the legislative body prescribes for their government. It is as separate as it is in this country, where we legislate and put in the hands of our executive officers the administration of the laws that we pass, and I take it that is the purpose that the chairman of the committee and his associates had in framing this bill and to administer for the non-Christian tribes. On the whole, Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me, it is the very wisest possible thing we could do. It is not possible even to give them absolute representation without any authority over it, and so we come just as nearly as we possibly could to giving them representation in their own legislative body and create an entirely independent bureau to administer the laws that we pass for them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That the terms of office of elective senators and representatives shall be four years from the 16th of October following their election. In case of vacancy among the elective members of the senate or in the house of representatives, special elections may be held in the districts wherein such vacancy occurred under such regulations as may be prescribed by law, but senators or representatives elected in such cases shall hold office only for the unexpired portion of the term wherein the vacancy occurred. Senators and representatives appointed by the Governor General shall hold office until removed by the Governor General.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "four," in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Iowa that he recognized the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON].

Mr. TOWNER. I want this amendment passed on, if the gentleman will permit. Will the gentleman permit me to do so?

Mr. QUEZON. All right.

Mr. TOWNER. I move to strike out the word "four," in line 6, and in lieu thereof insert the words "six and three years, respectively."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 13, line 6, by striking out the word "four" and inserting the words "six and three years, respectively."

Mr. TOWNER. This is in accordance with the action we have taken before.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I suppose that will not confuse the matter. Now there is a provision that one-half of the senators elected only hold for three years——

Mr. TOWNER. That provision, the gentleman will understand, refers to the first election.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand that.

Mr. TOWNER. So there will be no confusion at all, I think.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman has thoroughly considered that and is satisfied in his own mind now about it, I am willing to accept it.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like for the gentleman himself to consider it, as well.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I have just this moment received two cablegrams from the Philippines, the contents of which ought to fill every patriotic American, regardless of his political affiliation, with joy and pride. One year ago this month a new Governor General for the Philippine Islands arrived in Manila, and was there met with a very warm and enthusiastic reception by thousands upon thousands of people, many of whom came from the farthest corners of the archipelago. This Governor General was the Hon. Francis Burton Harrison, of New York, formerly a distinguished Member of this House and now the chief executive of the Philippine Islands. [Applause.] Arches, bands of music, waving flags, and fragrant flowers spoke of the good will and the high expectations of the people of the Philippines regarding their new Governor General. What was the meaning of this magnificent and unprecedented reception given to a foreign governor. Was it, perhaps, that at last the Filipino people had forsaken their desire to be the masters of their own destinies and were actually glad to receive a foreign ruler? No; the Filipino people were then as much as they had ever been—indeed, as much as they are to-day—united in their aspiration to have as their chief executive a man of their own kind and of their own free selection. But they had heard of Gov. Gen. Harrison before; they had read some of the remarks made by him upon this floor, when he was still a Member of this House, touching upon the Philippines, and they knew thereby that Gov. Harrison had accepted the Governor Generalship of the islands for no purpose other than that of helping the Filipino people to harvest the precious fruit of their patriotic endeavors as well as to do his part in bringing about the early redemption of the pledge of his own people to give the islands their own government. So the Filipino people looked upon the incoming Governor General from the very moment when they learned of his appointment not as their new ruler, but rather as their adviser, friend, and advocate. And so they received him with open arms and loving hearts.

The Filipino people have not been disappointed in Gov. Gen. Harrison. He has almost surpassed our expectations. During the year which has just elapsed since the day he landed on Philippine shores he has given us ample evidence that he is an able, efficient, sympathetic, and just executive and administrator; a sincere friend of our country, earnestly striving to promote its welfare and its liberty. For this reason, upon the anniversary of the governor's arrival at Manila, there was a great public demonstration, equal to if not surpassing in its display of affectionate feeling the one given him upon his arrival.

I shall read, Mr. Chairman, these cablegrams I hold in my hand, for they will tell better than I could myself of what took place in Manila. One cablegram reads:

Over 50,000 Filipinos from every walk in life and irrespective of political affiliations marched to-day to Malacanang Palace to celebrate the first anniversary of the arrival of Gov. Harrison. A delegation from the people presented the governor with an album containing a signed resolution, requesting President Wilson to keep Mr. Harrison as Governor General until the Philippine policy of the President, as outlined in his message to the Filipino people, delivered through Gov. Harrison last year, has been carried out, and conveying to Gov. Harrison the confidence and faith of the Filipino people in their governor, as well as commending his untiring and successful efforts to carry out the President's policy. Gov. Harrison addressed the gathering briefly, as follows:

"Your presence in such great numbers does me honor far beyond my deserts, but more important still you once more display the good will and confidence of the people of the Philippines toward the people of the United States. Our people are your friends, and they are proud of your progress and your accomplishments. As the representative of the United States, I desire most earnestly to merit your continued friendship and cooperation. Both these you have already shown me in unmeasured terms.

"One year ago I delivered to you a message from President Wilson. He then authorized me to say, 'We regard ourselves as trustees acting not for the advantage of the United States but for the benefit of the Philippine Islands. Every step we take will be taken with a view to the ultimate independence of the islands and as a preparation for that independence.' To both of these principles I now reaffirm my unyielding allegiance. To both these principles I have adhered during this past year with unfaltering determination. To both I shall continue to adhere. And in this determination you have rendered me your assistance in every way. With patience, with dignity, and with wisdom you have justified the words of President Wilson toward you. The year has been one in which Filipinos may well take pride—not only the few in office but the great mass of the people as well. In the future you will tread with ever-increasing powers of self-government the same path of moderation, of justice, and of progress. Let us continue to work together united and in harmony."

Another says that a committee, composed of representative Filipinos from every walk in life and of delegations from all the most important social associations in the Philippines, adopted the following resolution:

Whereas the benefits of good laws and liberal constitution are only shared by the people through the faithful execution of these laws and the mandates of said constitution by executives jealous of the strict compliance of their duties; and

Whereas the Hon. Francis Burton Harrison, Governor General of the Philippine Islands, ever since his assumption of office has faithfully interpreted and executed not only the laws and the constitution of the Philippine Islands but also the policy of the President of the United States, as outlined in his message to the Filipino people and conveyed to them by said Gov. Gen. Harrison, so much so that he has brought to the public mind the conviction that there now exists in these islands a government that protects life and liberty and promotes prosperity alike to the natives and to the foreigners, the undersigned representing the people of Manila and neighboring Provinces—

Resolved, First, that a visit be paid to said Governor General, the Hon. Francis Burton Harrison, at Malacanang Palace at 4 p. m. on the 11th day of October, in order to give him a public and official testimony of the great satisfaction that the people of the Philippine Islands feel for his upright and wise administration.

Second. That copies of this resolution be sent to the Philippine Commission and the Philippine Assembly.

Third. That copies of this resolution be sent to the Resident Commissioners in the United States, with the request that they communicate the same to the Congress and to the President of the United States and state at the same time the ardent desire of the people of the Philippines that said Hon. Francis Burton Harrison remain as chief executive of these islands.

Fourth. That a copy of this resolution be presented to the Governor General, Francis Burton Harrison, written in an album and signed by the executive committee and other representative persons who may wish to do so.

Mr. Chairman, it is only natural that the Filipino people should thus feel toward their present Governor General. They owe it to him, since he has under the most difficult circumstances succeeded in giving them an efficient and very satisfactory government. The first anniversary of Mr. Harrison's administration shows a reduction in the expenses of the Philippine Government, as compared with the last six months of the preceding calendar year, of $2,000,000 per annum, out of a total expenditure which had been in the past slightly less than $15,000,000 per annum. Nearly one-half of this great saving had been effected in the expenses of bureaus and offices, and represented real economy in that it showed a reduction in the "overhead" cost of administering the affairs of the islands.

A portion of the governor's first message to the Philippine Legislature was devoted to a description of the financial difficulties which the insular government was facing upon his arrival. The saving effected, as I have already indicated, shows how great an effort and how much courage and determination were necessary to accomplish this great reduction in the expenses of the government. I shall not detain the House by reading this message, but the American people should be acquainted with it, and therefore I shall insert it in this part of my remarks. The message referred to is as follows:

ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Gentlemen of the legislature, for the first time since the occupation of the Philippine Islands by the United States a Democratic administration assumed control of the United States Government upon the 4th of last March. Ten days ago, as the representative of that administration, I came to you as your chief executive bearing a message from President Woodrow Wilson. That message, indicating the policy of the President in respect to these islands, I have already delivered to the Philippine people in his name.

The President has promised that he will give immediately to the people of the Philippines, as the first step toward carrying out his policy, a majority of the appointive commission. This legislature will, therefore, for the first time have a majority of native citizens in both branches. In consequence the eyes of the American people will be upon this legislature with a confident expectation that it will furnish to the world a proof that you are capable of self-government and that it will measurably advance the day of independence.

You begin your labors at a time of profound peace throughout the islands. It is our duty to conserve it.

GOVERNMENT AND BUSINESS.

Every legitimate business enterprise should and will receive the protection of the Insular Government. But we must bear in mind that business is intended to serve the Government, not the Government to serve business. The duty of government is to see that every business man receives an equal opportunity before the law, not that any business man should enjoy a special privilege.

The best service that a government can properly render to commercial enterprise is to restore confidence and to promote good feeling. If the new administration here shall be the instrument of bringing about a better understanding between the different elements of the community, it will be promoting the best interests of the business world. Good feeling between all classes of residents in the islands is the best asset of a business community. It should be our duty and it will be my constant preoccupation to leave nothing untried to bring about this happy result.

Before proceeding to a discussion of any other matter, I submit for your consideration a report recently made by the former secretary of the interior of this Government upon the subject of slavery.

DEFICIT DEMANDS ECONOMY.

My term of service in this Government has been short. I am not at this moment prepared to advise with you upon all subjects of public interest. At a future day I shall ask your indulgence to send to you other messages upon matters of public moment. For the present I direct your attention to one special subject in my judgment of paramount importance.

The most pressing need of the hour is economy in the public expenditures. This matter, in my opinion, is the most important question now affecting the success and welfare of this Government. Based upon the estimates of probable receipts and expenditures for the current fiscal year, as published by the auditor, it is probable that the Government, without the adoption of a drastic program of economy is face to face with a deficit of about four and a half million pesos.

From June 30, 1908, when the surplus in the insular treasury was ₱17,499,894.97, the surplus has fallen as of June 30, 1913, to ₱14,230,220.23. Of this sum, however, about ₱5,000,000 is only nominally available, it being invested in supplies and having been carried to the surplus account in 1911, thus leaving an actual cash surplus in hand at the conclusion of the last fiscal year of only about ₱9,000,000.

This shrinkage in the available surplus of the Goverment has come about notwitstanding the fact that during this period of four years the sum of ₱6,000,000 has been obtained by the sale of an issue of public works bonds, and expended out of the treasury, and notwithstanding the further fact that a little less than three and a half million pesos from the gold standard fund has during this period passed through the treasury in the same way.

At the present rate the auditor on June 30, 1913, estimated that the current expenditures of this Government would exceed the income by about ₱2,000,000 in the course of the fiscal year. In this connection it is fair to say that the insular collector of customs, in making his estimate to the auditor, properly discounted the fact that owing to the limited importation of rice the custom revenues would fall, and they actually have fallen in the first two months about ₱1,600,000. It is also fair to state that the estimates made at the same time by the collector of internal revenue were probably exaggerated when he predicted an increase of about ₱1,000,000 in internal revenue; in any event it is certain that this expected increase has not only failed to materialize thus far, but that we are actually running behind the internal-revenue receipts of the preceding fiscal year in a sum which for the first three months has exceeded ₱100,000. This decrease may possibly be offset by the collection of the new income tax.

While it is possible that the income from customs may improve somewhat from the present date, approximately ₱3,000,000 may be figured as the probable deficit based upon the ordinary income and expenditure of the government for the present year. To this we must add the sum of ₱1,500,000 of which the treasury is to be deprived in the balance of the current year by the passage of the Underwood tariff bill, which removes the tax upon exports.

COMMENDS UNDERWOOD BILL.

Too much can not be said in commendation of the Underwood tariff bill in its relation to the Philippine Islands. Not only does this act remove the limitations imposed by the Payne law upon the amount of sugar, tobacco, and rice which may be exported free to the United States, but in removing the export tax upon such commodities as hemp, copra, and sugar a heavy burden of taxation is lifted from the shoulders of the farmers of the Philippine Islands, and an immediate increase in their prosperity is confidently expected as a result of this measure.

Our treasury is therefore obviously approaching a point where a deficit of ₱4,500,000 confronts us. How, then, shall we avoid this deficit and restore the finances of our government to a normal and self-supporting condition? In my judgment but one course is open to us. I can not offer to you the possibility of an issue of public bonds to recoup the treasury. However much justification might be found in the eyes of some for a bond issue for some work of great public importance, no argument can support, under any system of government, a bond issue to meet current expenses. Indeed, a bond issue to recoup a falling treasury is tantamount to a confession of bankruptcy. Even if we could hope to secure congressional action upon an application for such an issue of bonds we would be condemned in the eyes of other nations for a failure to manage our affairs here upon a sound and conservative basis.

I repeat, then, only one course lies before us, and that is economy of the most drastic kind. In considering the question of economy I urge upon the members of the legislature that they approach this subject in a spirit of cooperation and self-sacrifice. It may be that for the time being partial cessation of some of the public works will be required, and this may bring temporary disappointment to certain localities in the islands, but it is my earnest hope and intention that as soon as the treasury can be restored to a sound basis, the public works shall go forward uninterrupted and with renewed zeal.

A considerable burden is also laid upon the treasury by the large proportion of American employees in this Government. While the enunciated policy has been to reduce this number as rapidly as possible consistent with the demands of fairness and efficiency, the last annual report of the bureau of civil service shows that there were more Americans having a permanent status in the Philippine civil service in 1912 than in any previous year since 1905. At the present time no further civil-service employees should be brought here from the United States to fill purely clerical positions, nor in any event except where special requirements may make such course necessary.

TOP-HEAVY BUREAUCRACY.

These islands have need of a simple and scientific form of government. Instead of that, we find a complicated and top-heavy system of bureaucracy. Much can be done toward simplifying this bureau form of government, and in this connection I invite your consideration to the possibility of a reduction in the number of the bureaus by consolidation or otherwise. It has also been suggested that some of the salaries of the higher Government officials are disproportionate to the size of the insular revenues. When you proceed to a discussion of this question, I strongly recommend to you that no change be in any event effected in the judicial salaries, nor in the salaries of employees who are receiving ₱5,000 or less. We find, moreover, that as an incident to highly centralized bureaucratic government a number of offices have been created and salaries have been raised without, what seems to me to have been, due authority of law; and as further inevitable result of bureaucracy, here as elsewhere, too many offices now exist. You are invited to scrutinize the bureaus of this Government with an eye to economy in that respect.

A further and perhaps considerable saving might be effected by a change in our method of appropriations; good usage elsewhere commends to us a system of direct treasury appropriations.

In this connection it is my hope that previous differences of opinion between the two houses may now be removed. This legislature, which meets to-day, should proceed to its work with a determination that the two houses will act in harmony, and that the necessary supply bills of the Government may become law by the joint will of the legislature instead of through the individual fiat of the executive.

ON TRIAL.

The present financial condition of this treasury calls for action of the highest order of self-denial and patriotism on the part of this legislature. The President has promised you a majority in the upper house, so that you may have control of both branches of your legislature. In doing this he placed upon you the responsibility to show to the whole world your capacity to legislate. Here at the outset a severe trial is upon you. I call upon each member of this legislature to do his share in the work which I have outlined. I do this assured that in this first and perhaps most severe test to which your honorable body will be subjected you will prove entirely worthy of the confidence placed in you by the President of the United States.

Great and commendable as is the work done by Gov. Gen. Harrison in the direction I have described, it is not all nor is it the most important of his achievements within a very short period of time. When he came to the islands the Filipino people were beginning to doubt their insular administrators. Ever since the beginning of the American administration, and in accord with the celebrated instructions of President McKinley, Governors General have been promising to place Filipinos in the appointive positions of that government as soon and as fast as they could show themselves capable of filling those positions. Yet in his report for 1909 Gov. Gen. Forbes, speaking of the bureau of civil service, said that the progress made in increasing the proportion of Filipino employees was not satisfactory. Gov. Gen. Harrison found that in 1912, as shown in the report of the bureau of civil service for that year, there were more Americans having a permanent status in the Philippine service than in any previous year since 1905. Gov. Gen. Harrison came forward with the fearless purpose of redeeming the pledges of his predecessors as much as with that of carrying out the policies of the President and making his own desires effective. He therefore began to appoint Filipinos to responsible positions, and his early action on this score at once revived the declining faith of the people of the Philippine Islands in the protestations of the previous Governors General. Both the policies of economy and that of doing justice to the Filipino people provoked a storm of criticism on the part of the necessary victims of such a policy, and Gov. Gen. Harrison was accused of disorganizing the Philippine Government, of disregarding the civil-service rules, and of using the methods of the ward politician. An article purporting to be an interview with Gov. Gen. Harrison saw the light in a Honolulu newspaper. This was quoted and requoted and several times reprinted to show that Gov. Gen. Harrison was an ordinary politician, to be ranked with those who believe in and practice the spoils system in its most extreme form. One of the most nortorious occasions on which use was made of this supposed interview was the citation of it by ex-Secretary Dean C. Worcester, formerly of the Philippine Government, in his book entitled "The Philippines—Past and Present," published after the Philippine Islands had been relieved of his authority. On page 377 of his book I quote the following:

> While in Honolulu, en route to Manila, Mr. Harrison gave out an interview, which I am credibly informed he has since confirmed in substance. It contained the following statements:
> "For years I have been of the minority in Congress, and have seen the Democrats kicked about, trampled upon, and otherwise manhandled by Republicans, so that I must confess it now gives me a saturnine pleasure to see the Democrats in a position to do the same thing to the Republicans."
> His early official acts after arrival at Manila confirmed the belief that this was indeed the spirit in which he was facing the great responsibility which there confronted him.
> It is beyond doubt or cavil that high ideals heretofore have prevailed in the Philippine civil service. Are they now to be substituted by the methods of the ward politician?

I do not know who was this credible informant of Mr. Worcester. But ever since he began his attack upon Gov. Gen. Harrison he has been disseminating so much of the same "credible information" which proved afterwards to be absolutely unreliable that it makes no difference who this particular informant is. I received a cablegram some time ago from Gov. Gen Harrison in answer to one of inquiry from me positively denying that he had ever made such statements. I did not need to ask him, and I hope the Governor knew that I did not cable him for that purpose, in order to assure myself that he did not grant such an interview. I have the honor of knowing personally the motives that inspired Gov. Gen. Harrison in accepting the Governor Generalship of the Philippine Islands. I saw what he did following his assumption of office, and I was therefore fully aware that the alleged interview was a falsehood—the mere invention of an unscrupulous reporter. But I sent this cablegram to the Governor in order to be able to say that he positively and directly repudiated the interview.

The truth is that the methods of Gov. Gen. Harrison in matters of appointment are absolutely free not only from any justified charge but even from any appearance of justification that he has employed the methods of—in the words of Mr. Worcester—"a ward politician." Gov. Gen. Harrison has not given positions in the Philippine Government to personal friends. He has not brought with him relatives to do business in the islands or to engage in agriculture on lands rented or purchased from the Philippine Government, and this dignified conduct of the Governor is the more praiseworthy since he is the first Governor General of the islands, who was previously a Member of Congress, and had therefore many political friends, a circumstance which doubtless has on more than one occasion put to a test his integrity of character and devotion to duty. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The all-embracing activity of our Governor General made it possible for him not only to reduce the expenses of the Philippine Government, not only to relieve that government of unnecessary officials, not only to give to the Filipinos such posts as they should immediately have, but also to dispose of every question that required immediate attention and to inaugurate a successful system of government for the non-Christian tribes, which before his attempt had been looked to as sure to produce dreadful effects. Gov. Gen. Harrison has practically solved the so-called Moro problem. The Filipinos professing the Mohammedan religion and inhabiting the islands of Jolo and western and central parts of Mindanao have given continuous trouble to the American Government. They were never actually under the control of Spain, and it had been stated that said Filipinos who are called Moros could be governed only by a strong military force that must be composed primarily of Americans. There were suggestions that, in the words of an old saying, somewhat adapted, "The only good Moro is the dead Moro." At all events, it was most emphatically asserted that they could not be governed by a civil governor. In consultation with the Army commanders of the Philippines and of the War Department, Gov. Gen. Harrison substituted a civil for the military government of the Moro Province before he was two months in Manila, and to-day a new law has already been enacted that has reorganized the government of that country, with the result that there is to-day complete tranquillity and peace among these supposedly indomitable people; with the further result that there are more schools and better sanitation among them, and with the crowning result that twice as much land was under the plow on March 31, 1914, as there was when Gov. Carpenter, of the Moro Province, was inaugurated in November or December of last year. The other non-Christian inhabitants of the Philippines have also been properly dealt with. It was the old policy to isolate them from the Christian Filipinos. There were indications that this was done with no very sane purpose. At any rate, it was a most unreasonable plan, sure to accomplish, whether so meant or not, the development in the Philippines of a people within another people, differing in ideas and customs with, if not antagonistic to, the latter. It retarded the development of the former by depriving them of intercommunication with their more advanced and civilized brethren. Gov. Gen. Harrison, in consultation and in accord with the able and industrious secretary of the interior, Hon. Winfred T. Denison, has reversed that policy and has inaugurated a new one, by which contact between the Christians and non-Christians is brought about and a more intimate relation is created, while more attention is given to their education and to their health. The secretary of the interior, in his instructions to his delegate for the government of the non-Christians, said:

You shall endeavor to make yourself in good truth the unifier, tearing down as rapidly as possible the walls which have isolated the non-Christians from the Christians.

Gov. Gen. Harrison has not only merited the love of the Filipinos themselves, but the applause of his superiors—the Secretary of War and the President. Upon the passage of the first appropriation bill enacted by the Philippine Legislature, in accord with the suggestion of the Governor General in his message, to which I have before referred, the President sent him a cablegram expressing his appreciation for his successful administration, and the Secretary of War sent him the following message:

I congratulate you upon the passage for the first time in three years of a general appropriation bill and on the fact that the bill was passed unanimously by both houses. I have no doubt but that there were, as to a great many features, differences of opinion, but it is a source of satisfaction to the department that such differences were satisfactorily adjusted. Please extend to both houses of the Philippine Legislature my congratulations on this event and express to them my hope that this is but an indication of what may be expected in the future.

Mr. Chairman, I shall no longer detain the House with this topic, though I am sure, from the close attention with which the committee has heard me, that the Members are glad to hear of the wonderful accomplishments of a dear friend and once their colleague. I want to say only one other word, and I mean it for every American interested in the Philippine Islands. The Filipinos owe to Gov. Gen. Harrison a debt of gratitude that they can never pay. He has served as faithfully as the most intelligent and patriotic of their own people or of their own selection could have done. He has served disinterestedly, devotedly, and untiringly. May God grant that he remain at the head of our government, representing this great Nation there, until the day shall have arrived when the Filipino people may elect his successor. But Gov. Gen. Harrison has not only served, not even mainly served, the people of the Philippine Islands; he has also served his own people, the people of the United States. He has served them both in a practical way and in furthering their ideals of government. He has served them in a practical way because the policies of Gov. Gen. Harrison, his gentleness and justness in dealing with the Filipino people, have made the Filipinos better friends of the Americans. To-day the American employee, the American business man, is better liked and better helped by the Filipinos. He has served them in furthering the ideals of this Government, as the Governor General himself stated it in his speech at the banquet of welcome tendered him the night of his arrival in Manila. These are his own words:

Standing here before this flag, to which I, in common with you, owe allegiance, and of which I am proud, I pledge to you that the best service that I can render to my country is to render service to the best aspirations of the people of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. Chairman, I entertain the hope that the day will sometime arrive when the arrival of Gov. Gen. Harrison in the Philippines will be celebrated as one of our national holidays. [Applause.]

In connection with my remarks, I wish to print the following interview given by the Secretary of War, which was published in the Christian Science Monitor, and also a short quotation from a very responsible newspaper in the United States, that may give the keynote to the attacks made upon Gov. Gen. Harrison:

Mr. Secretary, you were quoted the other day as saying that a good many misstatements were being printed about the situation in the Philippines, and that you would like the people to get information that is accurate and truthfully reveals conditions. I would like very much to have certain points cleared up.

Answer. I will be very pleased to give you any information you want about the Philippines.

Question. Has the criticism of the Harrison administration been unusually severe?

Answer. If you will look back through your files and that of other leading newspapers, you will find that it has not been, compared to the criticism which has met every change of the past in the islands. Every change or step taken by the American Government has been met with a great deal of criticism and much loose talk, and you will find that most of such statements were untrue and much of the criticism and condemnation without foundation in fact

Question. This is interesting, Mr. Secretary, in view of the impression sought to be created that in the past all was fair sailing in the Philippines, and no breeze of adverse criticism had rippled the seas. May I ask what were the subjects of adverse criticism?

Answer. You will recall the bitter criticisms of the conduct of our Army in suppressing insurrection; the criticism that civil government was established too soon, while the "iron hand was still necessary to enduring peace"; that the civil government was extravagant and incompetent; that it favored a policy of exploitation ruinous to the natives and in the interest of a few Americans. These are but a few of the subjects which one recalls without the need of investigation and without looking up the records.

Question. I am told that the present criticisms are entitled to greater weight because of the fact that in the past the criticisms had their origin in America, while the present criticisms are an echo of the American press in the islands and are based on statements of persons fresh from the islands. Is that so?

Answer. It is true that the American press criticisms are but echoes of the American press in the islands and a repetition of statements made by those returning from the islands. It is not true that this was otherwise in the past.

The attack on Mr. Taft following his formulation of the motto: "The Philippines for the Filipinos," was most bitter in the American press of Manila. Mr. Taft was represented by that press to be the most unpopular American in the islands.

His reply to this criticism in his speech before the Union Reading College, Manila, P. I., on December 17, 1903, has given the record of this feeling at that time a permanent place in the history of the government of the islands. The speech would serve, with few changes, to reply to present critics, including Mr. Taft, Mr. Worcester, and others. The basis of present criticisms is identical and the source is the same.

Later, the criticisms of Gov. Forbes were quite as bitter in the Philippine-American press as in the United States, the only difference between the cases of Gov. Forbes and Mr. Taft being that the press differed in the Forbes controversy, while it was unanimous in abusing Mr. Taft.

Question. What do you think produces this spirit of attack, and why should this be so?

Answer. Well, for one reason, of course, any who have been displaced always make a lot of noise and get their friends interested in condemning those in authority. Furthermore, there is a unique situation out there in this: There are Americans in business there, and when changes are made in the heads of the Government they, of course, desire to establish some form of intimate relations; and very often when they find that they are not being consulted either as frequently or as intimately as they think they should be, they retaliate by unfounded condemnation and general damning of the new officials. Or where, as on one occasion in the past, there has been a feeling that the Governor General was too friendly with one section of the American public, the criticism was even greater.

Question. Has there been any unusual dismissals of American employees under the Harrison administration?

Answer. No; the number of dismissals has not been unusual. It has increased slightly, due to necessary retrenchment. The number, however, is not one-half of what it was in years like 1903 and 1904, nor so great as it was in 1905 and 1906, when there was an effort at retrenchment.

Question. What is there in the charge that the civil-service rules have been disregarded? How many Americans, all told, has Gov. Harrison taken out to the Philippines and put into positions there?

Answer Not a single instance has been brought to my attention where it was charged that Gov. Harrison had disregarded civil-service rules. Fewer Americans have been taken to the islands during Gov. Gen. Harrison's administration than during any similar period in recent years.

Of Americans coming from the United States since his arrival he has appointed the collector of customs, one member of the municipal board of the city of Manila, and one member of the public utilities commission.

Question. What are the important positions to which the Governor General might, if he so desired, appoint his American political friends?

Answer. First, the chiefs of bureaus of the Government, of which there are about 22. Second, the judges of first instance in the islands, of which there are 36. All of these judicial positions have been filled by appointment since Gov. Harrison arrived in the islands. Third, miscellaneous appointments, such as the members of the municipal board of the city of Manila, governor of the department of Mindanao and Sulu, and members of the public utilities commission.

Question. Now, Mr. Secretary, in how many of these has the Governor actually appointed Americans brought by him from the United States?

Answer. Of the heads of the bureaus of the Philippine Government Gov. Harrison appointed one—the collector of customs—from the United States—Dr. Herstein. Dr. Herstein had been an employee of the United States civil service for some years. He was a tariff expert employed in the framing of the recent United States tariff. His politics are not known to me.

He appointed, as a member of the municipal board of the city of Manila, Dr. Fitzsimmons, who had served in the islands formerly.

He appointed, as a member of the public utilities commission, Stephen Bonsal, a well-known American newspaper and literary man.

He reappointed every judge of first instance on the bench, and in filling the remaining vacancies he selected two Americans, one of whom had been long in the service of the islands and one who had been in the islands only a short time in the civil service, but had previously been in the civil service of the United States.

Question. What basis is there for the statement that business is disorganized in the islands and that the economic conditions are upset?

Answer. About as much basis as there is for such a statement with reference to the United States. It is perfectly well known to anyone who is searching for the truth that there has been a world-wide business depression, and that while in particular communities this depression may have been enhanced or mitigated by local conditions, this has only been in the matter of degree. In the Philippines, due to the exclusively agricultural basis of business, this depression has been least. Unquestionably, some business men wished to know the course that this administration purposed to pursue before they embarked in any extension of their business enterprises. But to suggest seriously that there has been any panicky condition produced in the Philippines by anything that this Government has done or left undone is simply to state that which has not the basis of truth.

Question. But it has been said that there has been an immense falling in the imports into the islands, showing a lack of confidence in business conditions?

Answer. That the imports into the Philippines are, when analyzed, an indication of business conditions and confidence, or the lack thereof, is to an extent true.

However, one of the imports which varies most from year to year is rice. The importation of rice in large quantities is an indication of the failure of the local rice crop and, contrary to the general rule, its importation in large quantities is an indication rather of local distress than of a healthy condition.

The fiscal year 1912, i. e., the year ending June 30, 1912, was, measured by the total of imports, the most prosperous year up to that time in the history of the Philippines. The total imports were $54,549,980. But the dark spot was that of this total $10,519,949 was rice, the result of an unusually disastrous failure of the Philippine rice crop.

In the fiscal year 1913 the total imports showed an increase over the preceding year to $56,327,583, though the imports of rice were but $7,940,857.

The reports of Philippine commerce have now been received to include the month of May, 1914. I give the following from the records for purposes of comparison:

Total imports for 11 months ending May, 1912	$48,522,580
Total imports for 11 months ending May, 1913	51,543,134
Total for 11 months ending May, 1914	50,876,025

For the same periods, omitting rice:

1914	48,395,180

Of the total during these three periods there were from the United States:

In the face of this it is idle to talk of depression or lack of confidence.

Question. As a matter of fact, has the administration taken any radical step of any kind in the Philippines; and if so, what; and what effect do you think this has had?

Answer. As a matter of fact, the administration has not only taken no radical step, but has not done anything except to in good faith pursue the policy which has been announced to the Filipinos from the very beginning. All of the American Governors have promised them to put them into governmental positions just as soon as they were capable of performing the duties; that is, to bring about the so-called Filipinization of the service. You will find references and promises of this character in the reports and public utterances of every Governor General.

President Taft, when chairman of the Philippine Commission, and afterwards when Civil Governor, inaugurated this treatment of the Filipinos pursuant to specific instructions of President McKinley. In doing this he met with just the same storm of abuse which is now revived against Harrison. I have just recently seen a speech made by him in which he alludes at great length to this matter in vindication of his position. Referring to the invitation to make the address, Mr. Taft then said:

"The civil government was just then receiving even more criticism than usual from the young lions of the Manila press."

Later he says:

"Some of our young lions of the local press have spoken of the 'childish slogan: The Philippines for the Filipinos.' It is unnecessary to comment on the adjective used, but it is sufficient to say that, whether childish or not, the principle makes up the web and the woof of the policy of the United States with respect to those islands, as it has been authoritatively declared by two Presidents of the United States—for President Roosevelt has followed sedulously the policy of President McKinley—and by the interpretation of the supreme popular will, the Congress of the United States."

And, again:

"There are many Americans in these islands, possibly a majority—and this includes all the American press—who are strongly opposed to the doctrine of 'the Philippines for the Filipinos.' They have no patience with the policy of attraction, no patience with attempts to conciliate the Filipino people, no patience with the introduction into the government as rapidly as their fitness justifies of the prominent Filipinos. They resent everything in the government that is not American. They insist that there is a necessity for a firm government here rather than a popular one, and that the welfare of Americans and American trade should be regarded as paramount."

And with reference to the then attitude of the American press and merchants of the city of Manila, he said:

"The attitude of the American press and of the American merchant in his hostility to the Filipino, and in the consequent hostility to the civil government, was led into the error at one time of emphasizing in every possible way, by letters and representations of all sorts, that the condition of the country as to tranquillity was so bad that the whole of the islands was still in a state of war. Every small ladrone fight, every discomfiture which the constabulary suffered, was exaggerated and made the basis for inference that the conditions in the country were retrograding rather than improving. Such incidents were seized upon and made as much of as headlines and general statements could make them."

And with reference to its attitude toward the Filipino, he said:

"When one's feelings of enmity are very much aroused it is difficult to set the limit to the expression of them. So it is that we have the young lions of the American press, of the three newspapers who are supposed to speak the American public opinion in these islands, holding the Filipino up to contempt, exposing all his supposed vices, and giving him no credit whatever for any virtues, and it may be that this represents the feeling of the majority of the resident Americans in Manila But can we not, in the end, be just and give to the whole Filipino people their due? Should we wish the Filipino people to judge of Americans by the drunken, truculent American loafers who infest the small towns of these islands, living on the fruits of the labor of Filipino women, and give us more trouble than any other element in the islands? Should we wish the Filipino people to judge American standards of honesty by reading the humiliating list of American official and unofficial defaulters in these islands? I think not."

After reviewing the reiterated promises of the American Government in the islands and of the Presidents of the United States to look solely to the welfare of the Philippine Islands, Mr. Taft said again:

"Again, one of the conditions indispensable to progress is tranquillity. Without it capital, constitutionally timid, will not come. Now what has produced the present tranquillity? I say without hesitation that the chief element to-day is the confidence which the conservative people of the islands have in the promises of the United States to make the welfare of the Filipinos its chief purpose in remaining here and to assist them sincerely in learning the secret of self-government by gradually enlarging their political power."

And then:

"How long is it thought we could avail ourselves of this popular support if we repudiated our national promises and adopted the policy of repulsion and repression, dignified under the name 'the policy of a firm hand,' and if we said to the people, 'You are not to be trusted; the offices must all go to Americans; you are an inferior race and are sufficiently rewarded by having a superior race to come here and run your government for you?'"

And, finally, with reference to the policy of the American Government, he said:

"What do the young lions of the American press in Manila, what do the merchants of Manila who take the position I have attempted to explain and describe, expect to do? Do they expect to change the policy of the Government? Certainly not, as long as the Government of the United States is alive to the honor of preserving sacred its promises to a whole people. From where do they expect the political support that can be effective to carry out the policy which their attitude indicates? The policy of the present civil government in placing as its first aim the promotion of the welfare and the prosperity of the Filipino people and the gradual extension to them of self-government is the identical policy of the Republican Party as shown in its platform of 1900."

Question. To what do you attribute this apparent purpose of misleading the American public about the real situation?

Answer. Very largely to those who were fearful of some radical action on the part of the administration, which they thought would be disastrous to their own interests and to those who, not swayed by self-interest, feared that such action would be detrimental to the best interests of the islands and this country. That is to say, the fear that, without sufficient investigation and without careful consideration, this administration would cut all bonds between this country and the Philippine Islands and leave them to start as a national entity without any further guidance and control. If they had taken counsel of facts and not of their fears, they would not have started upon any such campaign. I do not think I am mistaken in believing that those who were the leaders in this clamor against Gov. Harrison would now, in view of all the facts, gladly destroy the record which they have made for themselves. Unfortunately many who have accepted these statements as facts have not the same means of ascertaining the truth, and now accept as facts what these leaders proclaimed from their fears and now have not the courage to deny.

Question. Mr. Secretary, what has been the policy of this administration toward the Philippines?

Answer. President Wilson plainly marked out our attitude toward the Philippines upon two occasions: First, when he authorized Gov. Harrison in his inaugural address to make the following statement:

"We regard ourselves as trustees, acting not for the advantage of the United States, but for the benefit of the people of the Philippine Islands. Every step we take will be taken with a view to the ultimate independence of the islands and as a preparation for their independence; and we hope to move toward that end as rapidly as the safety and the permanent interests of the islands will permit. After each step taken experience will guide us to the next. The administration will take one step at once. It will give to the native citizens of the islands a majority in the appointive commission, and thus in the upper as well as in the lower house of the legislature. It will do this in the confident hope and expectation that immediate proof will thereby be given in the action of the commission under the new arrangement of the political capacity of those native citizens who have already come forward to represent and lead their people in affairs."

Second, in his next annual message to Congress, in which he said as follows:

"No doubt we shall successfully enough bind Porto Rico and the Hawaiian Islands to ourselves by ties of justice and interest and affection, but the performance of our duty toward the Philippines is a more difficult and debatable matter. We can satisfy the obligations of generous justice toward the people of Porto Rico by giving them the ample and familiar rights and privileges accorded our own citizens in our own Territories and our obligations toward the people of Hawaii by perfecting the provisions for self-government already granted them, but in the Philippines we must go further. We must hold steadily in view their ultimate independence, and we must move toward the time of that independence as steadily as the way can be cleared and the foundations thoughtfully and permanently laid.

"Acting under the authority conferred upon the President by Congress, I have already accorded the people of the islands a majority in both houses of their legislative body by appointing five instead of four native citizens to the membership of the commission. I believe that in this way we shall make proof of their capacity in counsel and their sense of responsibility in the exercise of political power, and that the success of this step will be sure to clear our view for the steps which are to follow. Step by step we should extend and perfect the system of self-government in the islands, making test of them and modifying them as experience discloses their successes and their failures; that we should more and more put under the control of the native citizens of the archipelago the essential instruments of their life, their local instrumentalities of government, their schools, all the common interests of their communities, and so by counsel and experience set up a government which all the world will see to be suitable to a people whose affairs are under their own control. At last, I hope and believe, we are beginning to gain the confidence of the Filipino peoples. By their counsel and experience, rather than by our own, we shall learn how best to serve them and how soon it will be possible and wise to withdraw our supervision. Let us once find the path and set out with firm and competent tread upon it, and we shall not wander from it or linger upon it."

Since it is the conceded fact that from the very beginning the American people, speaking through their representatives, have always disclaimed any intention to incorporate the Philippines as part of the American body politic, and since it has always been treated as only a question of time when they should have some form of national autonomy, the real matter to be considered by statesmen and by citizens who wish to do what is right is how to proceed in the matter so as to reach a just conclusion. This administration has proceeded along the line of experience, which, as the old adage tells us, is the best school; I think I would say practically the only useful school. The experiment which we made initially, as outlined in the quoted declaration of the President, has not only not proven unwise, but has proven very wise.

The next step to be taken, as provided in the pending Jones bill, is to give them further autonomous power; that is, to give them more participation in managing their own affairs, with, however, such reservations of guidance and control to the Federal Government as to enable it to see that no harm comes.

Question. What, in your judgment, will likely be the effect of this measure, if enacted into law, upon the Filipinos?

Answer. I can not see how it can be other than very favorable. The Filipinos who have sufficient knowledge and ability to deal with the subject realize that until they demonstrate their ability to operate successfully a government in all of its manifold and complexing aspects it would be unthinkable that the United States would be justified in withdrawing from its position of trusteeship. The only way in which they can demonstrate their capacity is after trial. Any body of citizenship which has not been accustomed to exercising governmental functions must become accustomed thereto before it can successfully do so. It is known historically that the Philippine people for centuries have not been governing themselves. It is not to be wondered at that they can not immediately evoke the public opinion which is necessary to all successful self-governments. The coherent and cohesive aggregation of public opinion is the result of training; and those who have the best interests of the Filipinos at heart, both natives and those of our country, realize that they must be given the opportunity to cultivate and cause to grow up the necessary patriotic cooperation before they can have a successful self-controlled government. What we have in view is to make the conditions favorable for the growth of that sort of patriotic cooperation, the linking together of these nationals, with a view of eventually finding in that country such a condition as makes likely the success of self-government.

We have done that which we think was wise and conservative and thoughtful to take the next step in laying the groundwork for this hoped-for eventful condition.

[From the St. Louis Mirror, December 12, 1913.]

Gov. Gen. Harrison is evidently trying to find out things from Filipinos, not from bureaucrats who have been living on the people. This is in line with the policy of giving Filipinos a majority in the important offices. The job holders don't like it. They can't bear to see the Governor General mixing up with the natives, who may tell him things about the secret government by concessionaires. Mr. Harrison has an idea, evidently, that government of the Philippines must be for the Filipinos and not exclusively for Yankee job holders and promoters. How extraordinary! No wonder Mr. Harrison has the disloyalty of the old-timers—better say "the old gang." They don't like this demonstration of the meaning of the New Freedom, which is also the old freedom.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of line 5, page 13, the word "elective," and in line 14 the last sentence, as follows:

Senators and representatives appointed by the Governor General shall hold office until removed by the Governor General.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 13, by striking out in line 5 the word "elective," and in line 14, after the word "occurred," strike out the words "senators and representatives appointed by the Governor General shall hold office until removed by the Governor General."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to make the term of the appointive senators and representatives who are to represent the non-Christian territory coterminous with the elective senators and representatives, and also to take away from the power of the Governor General a club that he might hold over his appointees to remove them at any time that he saw fit in case they would not reflect his opinion in their votes in either the senate or house of representatives.

I think it is abhorrent to our sense of representative government that even these appointees of the Governor General, the two senators and nine representatives, who will represent the non-Christian territory, should hold office at the mere beck and call of the Governor General to do his bidding in this assembly. We have adopted the policy in the previous section of having these representatives who look after the interests of these non-Christian territories appointed by the Governor General; but when once they are appointed they should be privileged to serve throughout the extent of their terms and should not be subject to removal without cause by the Governor General. I see the distinguished gentleman, the Commissioner from the Philippines, nodding his head as if in affirmance and as giving assent to this proposition. I hope he does reflect the ideas I am speaking for, because I can not imagine that these men should be subject to removal by the Governor General without any cause whatsoever.

If we take away this power, the Governor General, I assume, will in the first instance exercise rare judgment in the selection of the persons who are to represent these non-Christian people, and if perchance they should act at variance with his opinion it is not saying they should not continue in that representative capacity. They are not appointed to these legislative bodies as his personal representatives; they are appointed there to carry out what they believe to be for the best interests of the non-Christian people. If you are going to leave them subject to removal by the Governor General, instead of appointing two senators and nine representatives you might just as well—if you do not wish to give opportunity for the appointment of mere playthings in politics, mere automatons, to indicate the will of the Governor General—have one in the senate and one in the house who will always be regarded as the spokesman and rubber stamp of the Governor General.

I think this amendment should be adopted and accepted by the committee in carrying out that idea by giving the greatest representative government that is compatible with existing conditions in the islands to the Filipinos. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to oppose this amendment. The gentleman, of course, is aware of the fact that the Governor General himself has no fixed term. The President of the United States can remove him at any time, and the same is true of the members of the Philippine Commission. The President to-day can remove all nine of them. It is also——

Mr. STAFFORD. Subject, however, to confirmation by the Senate.

Mr. JONES. Subject to confirmation by the Senate, of course. That is, the appointment of their successors is subject to approval by the Senate, but the Senate has nothing to do with the removal of the Governor General and the other members. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that shortly before the end of the last administration one of the Philippine Commission, a distinguished citizen, a Republican, and a man who had been a member of the supreme court of one of our States, was removed summarily by the President of the United States because he did not agree with another member of the commission. He had been to the United States on a vacation. He had started back to the Philippine Islands and had gotten as far as Europe on his way when he was cabled to return to the United States. It seems that in the meantime Mr. Forbes had been here, had had a talk with the President, the result of which was his dismissal.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was in an administrative capacity, and——

Mr. JONES. I understand.

Mr. STAFFORD. And of course there had to be harmony of action where they were administering the affairs of the Philippines. This is a legislative capacity entirely.

Mr. JONES. Yes; and if the Governor General of the Philippines were to remove one of these representatives because he did not carry out his will, the President of the United States, if he did what was right, would immediately cut off the official head of the Governor General. That would be the action of the President.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose, then, that these representatives in the respective chambers are to be the reflex action or the representatives of the Governor General rather than representatives of these non-Christian people?

Mr. JONES. No. It is believed they will be the representatives of the non-Christian people, but, as I have said over and over during the course of this debate, the committee knows of no better way of selecting them than leaving it to the Governor General. These uncivilized people are not capable of selecting their own representatives, and the gentleman himself, I think, would not, if he would reflect for a moment, like to see a man put in the senate or house of representatives who, turning out to be utterly unfit for the trust reposed in him, the Governor General could not remove.

The Philippine Assembly once expelled one of its members for improper conduct, and it is possible that for some good and sufficient reason the Governor General may have to exercise the power here given him. I hope not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not leave that authority to them?

Mr. JONES. The legislature can not do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. We can give them that power here.

Mr. JONIES. It is easy to ask why we do not do this or that in the bill. The bill has been prepared with the utmost care, and the committee has come to the conclusion that this is the best way to solve this very difficult problem. And, as I said a few moments ago, it meets the approval of nearly everybody who has considered it. It meets the absolute approval of former Vice Gov. Gen. Gilbert, who was here a short time ago?

Mr. STAFFORD. Who is he?

Mr. JONES. He was the Vice Governor General of the Philippine Islands under the Taft administration, and he served in this House, I think, with the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I now recall the distinguished gentleman.

Mr. JONES. He is a very distinguished member of the gentleman's own party.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman had said he was formerly a Representative from the State of Indiana, I would have immediately recalled him. I remember him very well.

Mr. JONES. Well, that distinguished gentleman, who was once a member of the commission, who as Vice Governor General acted as Governor General in the absence of Gov. Forbes, was shown this provision of the bill, and he thoroughly approves it. He has been in the Philippine Islands a great many years and consequently has much knowledge as to conditions there.

Mr. CLINE. Let me say right there that I would hate to have any reflection cast against Mr. Gilbert. He is my dooryard neighbor and has been for a number of years.

Mr. STAFFORD. There was no intention of doing that.

Mr. CLINE. And I can vouch for his stand-pat Republicanism. It is as pure and undefiled as that of any Representative you have in this House.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose that is one reason why he is so much appreciated by the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] defeated him for reelection to this House, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. CLINE. He preceded me as a Member of this House.

Mr. STAFFORD. I recall his distinguished service as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, there is one other thought I wanted to suggest to the House, in addition to the suggestion made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES], as to why this amendment should not be adopted. The proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], if adopted, would provide that the appointive senator should have a term of six years under the Towner amendment, and there would be no control over him from any source. Now, the gentleman understands that there is a somewhat delicate situation existing between the non-Christian tribes and the government of the Philippine Islands. It is entirely within the range of possibility that the Governor General might make a selection of a senator or a representative for the non-Christian territory which would be good at the time it was made, and which would be satisfactory to the non-Christian people at the time it was made, but which, because of shifting conditions, might become unsatisfactory to that same people; and if there did not exist a power of removing such a man it might lead to very delicate and embarrassing results in the Philippine Islands. I am sure gentlemen can appreciate that fact when they think carefully of what the situation is in the Philippines.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That the senate and house of representatives, respectively, shall be the sole judges of the elections, returns, and qualifications of their elective members, and each house may determine the rules of its proceedings. Both houses shall convene at the capital on the 16th day of October following the next election and organize by the election of a speaker or a presiding officer, a clerk, and a sergeant at arms for each house, and such other officers and assistants as may be required. The legislature shall hold annual sessions, commencing on the 16th day of October, or, if the 16th day of October be a legal holiday, then on the first day following which is not a legal holiday, in each year and continuing not exceeding 90 days thereafter (Sundays and holidays not included). The legislature may be called in special session at any time by the Governor General for general legislation, or for action on such specific subjects as he may designate. No special session shall continue longer than 30 days, exclusive of Sundays. The legislature is hereby given the power and authority to change the date of the commencement of its annual sessions.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute a comma for the period following the word "proceedings," in line 20, section 18, page 13, and insert "punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member."

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I offered this amendment for the reason that I was unable to see why the legislature in the Philippines, both the house and the senate, should not have those powers that we give our own House and Senate under our own form of government. The right to determine the qualification of the members of that body ought to carry with it the right to depose the members, Mr. Chairman, if in the judgment of the assembly or of the senate the parties elected to represent certain districts were unworthy to sit as members of that body.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CLINE. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Would you think the legislature would not have that power unless it was specifically stated here?

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] that the legislature has that power now, I think. At any rate, it exercises it, and it has expelled one of the most popular Filipinos in the Philippines.

Mr. CLINE. It not only did that, I will say to the Chairman, but they expelled one of the members for conduct that was not becoming a member of the Philippine Assembly, and put another one on trial for the use of money in securing his election, and administered some form of punishment, the precise nature of which I do not distinctly recall now. At any rate, Mr. Chairman, we are writing an organic law for a new system of government in the Philippines.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I have no objection to the amendment. I do not think it is necessary, but I have no objection to it.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLINE. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. You would have that amendment apply to the appointive members?

Mr. JONES. To the elective members.

Mr. GORDON. It does not say that.

Mr. CLINE. I make that apply here to the members of both houses.

Mr. JONES. To the elective members?

Mr. CLINE. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. It only applies to elective members?

Mr. CLINE. Yes; that was my purpose.

Mr. GORDON. I did not understand it that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 21, after the words "on the," strike out "sixteenth" and "twelfth."

Mr. MOORE. Strike out "sixteenth" and insert "twelfth." Those words are printed there—"strike out" and "insert" are printed on the blank.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "sixteenth" and insert "twelfth." Also on page 14, line 1, after the words "on the," strike out "sixteenth" and insert "twelfth." Also at the end of the line strike out "sixteenth" and insert "twelfth."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a little while ago the Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands [Mr. QUEZON] read a cablegram in which was incorporated a speech by Gov. Gen. Harrison. He suggested at the close of his remarks—I refer to the Philippine Commissioner—that he hoped some day the 12th of October would be celebrated in the Philippines as a national holiday.

Now, here is a bill to establish a new form of government for the Philippines which proposes to open the legislature on the 16th of October. It seems to me, in view of the gentleman's remarks and the appropriateness of the day, that it might be a happy suggestion if the committee would accept this amendment and have this opening legislative day fixed as of the 12th of October instead of the 16th. If the committee will consent to move the event forward four days, then they will have the national holiday as the gentleman suggested.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, if the time ever comes when that day is fixed as a national holiday, I think it would be entirely inappropriate to have it on the meeting day of the legislature. I think one event would interfere very much with the other.

Mr. STAFFORD. They should be allowed to recover from the effects of the holiday?

Mr. JONES. Yes. As the gentleman says, they would probably want to recover from the effects of the celebration before the legislature met.

But, seriously, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Virginia will remember that he is speaking in my time.

Mr. JONES. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MOORE. I want to observe to the gentleman from Virginia that the 12th of October is, in many States of the Union, celebrated as a holiday now. It is an anniversary in American history. It is the day on which America was discovered by Christopher Columbus, and it would give an additional interest to the day in the Philippine Islands to have Congress open there then.

Mr. MILLER. I will say to the gentleman that Columbus was looking for the Philippine Islands when he stumbled on America on the 12th of October, 1492. [Laughter.]

Mr MOORE. Exactly. I do not know what day it was that the gentleman from Minnesota struck the Philippine Islands, but if you are going to establish these days as holidays it might be very appropriate to fix a "Miller Day" in the islands. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will yield, the only inappropriate feature about this suggestion is that Gov. Gen. Harrison did not land on the 12th of October, but on the 6th.

Mr. MOORE. Gov. Gen. Harrison was a distinguished Member of this House, whom we all respected very highly, and it would seem to me to be a graceful thing on the part of the Philippine Commission to give him a holiday. Gov. Harrison appealed to both sides of this House in his personal relations, and if the committee should deem it wise to move the opening of the legislature forward four days in his honor, we would have a Philippine national holiday and the opening of the legislature combined on the same day.

Mr. JONES. I do not suppose the gentleman is serious in his suggestion.

Mr. MOORE. I am serious. I think it is a very happy thought.

Mr. JONES. I do not think the gentleman can be serious. Even if the gentleman and the rest of us felt certain that the Filipinos were going to make that day a national holiday, I should not think it would be proper for the legislature to convene on that day. Mr. Chairman, this date was selected because it is the day upon which the legislature now meets. It was not the day upon which the legislature originally met, but it was subsequently, and after careful consideration, fixed upon.

Mr. MILLER. That was before the arrival of Gov. Gen. Harrison, was it not?

Mr. JONES. That was prior to his arrival; yes.

Mr. MILLER. They did not then have it in mind to celebrate the advent of Gov. Gen. Harrison.

Mr. JONES. The legislature has the right to change the date under this bill if it wishes to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

At the end of section 18, line 11, page 14, insert a new section, as follows——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential amendment to perfect the text before an amendment is offered as a new paragraph. Will the gentleman kindly withhold his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in lines 3, 4, and 5, on page 14, the words "and continuing not exceeding 90 days thereafter, Sundays and holidays not included."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 14, by striking out all after the word "year," in line 3, down to the end of the sentence.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the clause that I move to strike out limits the term of the general session of the legislature to 90 days. Immediately following is a provision limiting to 30 days the special session to be convened at the call of the Governor General. Those special sessions have to be limited to such legislation, either general or special subjects, as he may designate in his proclamation. I think it is highly important to the welfare of the Filipinos, if we are going to give them a large measure of control as this bill purports to give them, to have unlimited time in which to pass on legislation when convened generally once each year. I do not think this Congress should hamstring them in any way, so as to force them to consider legislation within any limited period. I am aware that the constitutions of some States limit the duration of the term of the legislature, but from my knowledge of those conditions I do not believe that limitation is conducive to good legislation. Certainly it is not desirable for a people who are just launching out in legislative practice. If at the end of the 90-day period they are not able to conclude their work, they are then at the mercy of the Governor General, either to have the matters pending included in a special call or to have the legislation go over to the next regular convening of the legislature. If they have reached that stage of political development where they can be trusted with legislative powers, and we are willing to delegate that authority to them, then let us not limit them so that they can not pass intelligently upon the general legislation that this bill intends to vest in the legislature.

We know that the longer the time given to the consideration of legislative measures the better is the consideration. Here we create a new legislature, consisting of an elective house and an elective senate, meeting and organizing. It will take considerable time for those bodies to organize. It will take some time for them to have their committees appointed. It will take considerable time for the committees to give consideration to legislation. Even with the ordinary appropriation bills it takes a couple of months for our committees to report the bills back to the House; yet in this bill you intend to limit these persons, who are unskilled in the art of legislation. The end of the 90-day period will come all too soon. They will be driven to pass bills on the spur of the moment, and it will not be possible to give proper consideration to legislative matters. If the committee think there should be some limitation, so that these Filipinos shall not continue in session all the time, if perchance they have a penchant for sitting in a legislative assembly and legislating, then lengthen the limited period; but I seriously contend that 90 days is altogether too short a period for these novitiates in the art of legislation. Personally I believe there should be no limitation. If they are capable of legislating in self-government, they alone should determine when the term of their legislature should end, and you should not leave them, in case of a limited term, at the mercy of the Governor General to determine what character of legislation may be considered at a special session. They have not the powers of Congress in that respect. When the President calls us in extraordinary session, he may call us for a special purpose, but he can not limit us to that particular class of legislation. Our powers in that respect are unlimited and supreme, and the Philippine Legislature should have the supreme right and ample time to pass upon the legislation that we delegate to them in this organic act.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this provision of the bill is similar to the provisions upon the same subject in most of the States of the Union. We have a similar provision in the constitution of my State. However, I do not feel inclined to oppose this amendment. I am willing to leave almost everything to the Filipinos themselves, and I shall not oppose the adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I now ask to have the amendment reported that I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 18, line 11, page 14, insert a new section, as follows:

"The senators and representatives shall receive a compensation for their services to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the treasury of the Philippine Islands. The senators and representatives shall in all cases except treason, felony, and breach of the peace be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the sessions of their respective houses and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either house they shall not be questioned in any other place."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me, I think there is not going to be any objection to the amendment offered, but I suggest whether or not it would not be well to provide that the compensation which the legislature has the power to fix shall be an annual compensation and not leave it so that the legislature could fix a per diem compensation. If the time is to be unlimited, I am rather inclined to think, in view of the amendment just adopted, that it would be good policy to require that it should be an annual instead of a per diem compensation.

Mr. CLINE. I think it is wise, in view of the amendment just adopted, and I ask leave, Mr. Chairman, to modify my amendment so as to make the compensation an annual one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that he ask that this section be passed over for the present and then return to it for the gentleman to perfect his amendment.

Mr. CLINE. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass over this section and then return to it in order that the gentleman from Indiana may offer his amendment hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the section be passed over and that the gentleman from Indiana be permitted to return to it later to offer his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question on this section. I would like to know whether the gentleman from Virginia would agree to limit the legislation in the special session to the call of the Governor General; whether he would be willing to strike out the last word on line 6, page 14, and all of line 17, and insert "to consider only such matters as he may designate"? In other words, whether you would be willing to limit the special session to such matters as the Governor General might designate?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the committee gave very careful consideration to this language before adopting it. There might be something very important to come up after the legislature had convened. If it could not consider it then, if it was of sufficient importance, another extra session would have to be called. After careful consideration we adopted the language in the bill.

Mr. FESS. I might say that in our constitutional convention two years ago we limited the legislation to the call of the governor of the special session, and we had a great deal of discussion on it. But the gentleman says that that question was considered fully.

Mr. JONES. Yes; we considered it very fully.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SLAYDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had excused Mr. SMITH of Arizona as one of the conferees on the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, and had appointed Mr. THOMPSON in his stead.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That every bill and joint resolution which shall have passed both houses of the legislature shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor General. If he approve the same, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his objections to that house in which it shall have originated, which shall enter the objections at large on its journal and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of the members elected to that house shall agree to pass the same, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of all the members elected to that house it shall be sent to the Governor General, who shall transmit the same to the President of the United States. The vote of each house shall be by the yeas and nays, and the names of the members voting for and against shall be entered on the journal. If the President of the United States approve the same, he shall sign it and it shall become a law. If he shall not approve same, he shall return it to the Governor General so stating, and it shall not become a law: Provided, That if any bill or joint resolution shall not be returned by the Governor General as herein provided within 10 days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him the same shall become a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the legislature by adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law. The Governor General shall have the power to veto any particular item or items of an appropriation bill, but the veto shall not affect the item or items to which he does not object. The item or items objected to shall not take effect except in the manner heretofore provided in this section as to bills and joint resolutions returned to the legislature without his approval.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, line 8, page 15, by striking out the word "ten" and inserting the word "thirty."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 15, line 8, by striking out the word "ten" and inserting the word "thirty."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the provision is that unless the Governor General shall veto a bill within 10 days it will become a law without his approval. I think the time is manifestly too short, and for this reason, which perhaps did not occur to the gentleman on the other side: I can conceive of a case where the Governor General seriously considers whether or not a veto shall be placed on a bill passed by the legislature, that it might, and almost certainly would, become his duty to communicate with the authorities at Washington regarding the matter before he takes such a responsibility. I think the time would be too short for this to be done, and, as I see it, no harm could come by extending it to 30 days.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. QUEZON. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to introduce further on an amendment providing that the absolute veto power be left in the Governor General's hands and not in the hands of the President of the United States?

Mr. TOWNER. I have such an amendment under consideration, but that need not affect consideration of the one I now offer.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I was not sure when the limit of 10 days was put in the bill that it would not be better to have it 15 days, but I have never thought that it would be right to have it as long as 30 days. If the gentleman would modify it to 20 days, I should be inclined to accept it.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not think 15 days is enough, but I will accept what I can get.

Mr. JONES. I would prefer 15, but rather than take up the time I will agree to 20.

Mr. TOWNER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will ask to modify my amendment by making it read "20" instead of "30."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks to modify his amendment by making it 20 days instead of 30. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, line 14, after the word "bill," insert the following: "or any independent provision not germane to the bill."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the reason I offer this amendment is this: The provision in the bill is that the Governor General shall have the power to veto any particular item or items of an appropriation bill, and then, so far as the extension of power is granted, it stops. I desire to add this further power to the Governor General which I think is accepted by most jurists now as a most important power, one that is being placed in new constitutions that are being adopted, that any independent provision which may be placed in a bill which is not germane to it, the thing that we call a "rider," should be subject to the veto of the Governor General. We all know how that works in Congress. We all know how many iniquities are perpetrated in Congress by such practice, and it is to avoid this that I offer the amendment. While it is given to the Governor General to veto an independent item of an appropriation bill, yet the legislature has the power to put any iniquitous, not germane, absolutely independent provision upon any appropriation bill and force the Governor General to sign the whole bill or allow the appropriation during the latter days of the session to fail.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the gentleman to another provision in the bill which I think he has overlooked, and that is that a bill must deal only with one subject matter, and that must be expressed in the title.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, that provision exists, as the gentleman well knows, in very many of the State constitutions, and in the passage by the legislature of these acts it is more honored in the breach than in the observance. Here is the difficulty with regard to that: For instance, an appropriation bill of that kind is passed, which would be subject to objection, which, if passed upon in the courts, might perhaps be held to be unconstitutional, and yet the importance of the passage of the law is so great that no one would dare raise the question and will suffer the iniquity to prevail rather than allow the bill to fail. Why should we not avoid these things, if we can, by the insertion of the provision which I suggest?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does not the gentleman's amendment limit itself to appropriation bills?

Mr. TOWNER. I hardly think so.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand the question of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I raise the question whether the amendment of the gentleman does not limit itself to appropriation bills, when I think he wants it to apply to all bills as well as appropriation bills?

Mr. JONES. I did not think the gentleman wanted it to apply to any but appropriation bills.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HELM. The thought occurred to me that such an amendment as that would be very fertile of litigation, and also that if the court is going to sit in judgment and say what is and what is not germane, it seems like investing the court with legislative power or power in legislative proceedings.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Why would not this cover it:

The Governor General shall have the power to veto any particular item or items or provision in an appropriation bill.

I do not think that power ought to be given except upon an appropriation bill, because it is on an appropriation bill that that sort of thing is done. I would leave out the word "germane" entirely.

Mr. TOWNER. The language of the amendment is:

And any independent provision not germane to the bill.

Mr. COOPER. I would eliminate the feature of germaneness and make it any independent provision. There can not be any coercion practiced that is iniquitous except in an appropriation bill, and the legislature has the power not to appropriate for the supplies of the government unless certain things are agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question if the gentleman from Iowa will permit.

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. If you limit it to an appropriation bill, the veto power of this bill extends to anything not germane without further amendment, because you can veto any item in the bill without affecting the other part of the bill. If the item is not germane, he will veto it as it stands, but the gentleman from Iowa wants it to apply to all legislation.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I understood the technical point the gentleman from Iowa had in mind was that the language "item or items" would mean appropriations.

Mr. TOWNER. I think that is true.

Mr. COOPER. In an appropriation bill those are items of appropriation, and if you say "item or items in an appropriation bill or any other provision therein contained" that would cover it.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say further, with regard to the matter, and especially with regard to what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] said, that I think the language that is used in this amendment is better than that suggested by him for the reason that if it is an independent provision which is not germane to the bill, it is as clearly designated as it would be possible to designate it by language. Such language has a well-determined meaning. We have had decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States of what is germane and what is not germane. It is not a difficult proposition. Speakers and others acting as such in the House have been passing upon that for years, and it is a question that is peculiarly within the court's province.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Is it not the desire of the gentleman from Iowa to give the Governor General of the Philippines the right to veto any provision in an appropriation bill?

Mr. TOWNER. It is.

Mr. COOPER. Whether it is germane or not?

Mr. TOWNER. Well, under the provisions of the bill now——

Mr. COOPER. Is it not true that the gentleman wants the Governor General to have the power to veto any provision in an appropriation bill, whether it be germane or not?

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman speaks about a "provision"——

Mr. COOPER. Well, any item.

Mr. TOWNER (continuing). While the language of the bill is "item." As the language of the bill now is, it says "shall have the power to veto any item or items of an appropriation bill," and that means particular appropriations for any particular purpose.

Mr. COOPER. If the gentleman said any item or provision in an appropriation bill that would cover it, but the gentleman wants him to have the power of veto whether it is germane or not?

Mr. TOWNER. I am inclined to think possibly it might have that interpretation. I do not question that. I am only saying this to make clear what is the purpose and intent of the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with my good friend from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], as highly as I respect his legal ability, that this is a desirable amendment. I think it really gives to the Governor General an arbitrary power that he ought not to have. The provision as to vetoing items in an appropriation bill is not an unknown provision in constitutions in different States in our country, and I think it is a wise provision, because it prevents the enforcement of an objectionable appropriation or item of law into a bill in order to secure the subsistence on which to run the government where there is a conflict between the governor and the legislature. But when you go beyond that, when you get away from appropriation bills and get to laws of other kinds, it seems to me that you have gone far enough when you provide by your constitution that which is in the constitution of many of the States of the Union, to the effect that the bill must only contain a single subject, and that subject must be clearly expressed in the title. That is a provision which is in the constitution of my own State, and it has led to considerable litigation, it is true, but it is better that we should go to the courts, in my opinion, than to leave it to the power of any Governor General arbitrarily to determine on the idea of germaneness. There would be absolutely no appeal from his decision. If he says, "I veto this provision in this bill because it is not germane," there is no appeal from his decision to any other tribunal except back to the legislature, where it will have to be passed by a two-thirds vote over his veto. I know of no such provision in any constitution of any State in this country. I am not familiar with the decisions of the United States Supreme Court to which the gentleman referred, discussing the question of germaneness, but the courts would never get any chance to pass on that proposition under this provision. It is left to the arbitrary power of the Governor General to exercise upon any idea that he might have on the question of germaneness. I do not think it is desirable or wise; on the contrary, I think it is dangerous.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I think, and have long thought, that the President of the United States ought to be given the power to veto any item in an appropriation bill that does not meet with his approval. In vetoing a measure he acts as a legislator. The exercise of the veto power is a legislative act. The President of the United States combines two functions—one, that of an executive, and the other that of a legislator. The act of vetoing a bill is the expression of his disapproval as a lawmaker. As a lawmaker he ought to have the right to be heard upon each item of an appropriation bill, and especially ought he to have the right to veto riders on appropriation bills. The Governor General in the Philippines ought to have a similar right. A rider may embody a proposition which the Philippine Assembly might desire to have become a law, but a proposition to which the Governor General and the Philippine Senate might be hostile. In such a case it would be possible for one house to say to the other house and to the executive, "We will refuse to help appropriate money to meet the necessary expenses of the government unless you will vote for this rider. You must take this rider, to which you are opposed, or we will starve the government." Legislation ought not to be the result of such coercion. It should be the free, untrammeled act of the legislature and the executive. The executive should have the right to say, "I am opposed to this provision in this appropriation bill. In my judgment it is a dangerous provision. Moreover, it is a provision that ought not to be in an appropriation bill at all. It is not an appropriation; it has no relation to any appropriation. I shall veto this particular item. If you wish it to become a law, you must again consider it and pass it by a two-thirds vote over my objection."

I have seen some very wrong things done in Congress through riders on appropriation bills and have more than once protested against them. We ought not to leave it possible for one house of the Philippine Legislature to say, "We will not pass the appropriations necessary to continue the Philippine Government unless you will take such or such a law for Mindanao or Mindoro or Cebu." The payment of the legitimate expenses of the Philippine Government ought to be a subject separate and apart and to be considered by itself.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. It will not be at all wise to permit the Philippine Legislature to put riders on appropriation bills.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I quite agree with the gentleman as to appropriation bills.

Mr. COOPER. And I would not put them on anything else.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And we have that provision in the bill. Of course, the gentleman is aware of that fact. But I want to ask him if he does not think it is probably dangerous to go beyond appropriation bills and take ordinary matters of legislation and vest in the Governor General the absolute power of determining whether a thing is germane or not and vetoing it on that ground?

Mr. COOPER. My idea is to confine it to appropriation bills at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 12, after the word "shall," strike out "not be a law" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "be made a matter of record in the office of secretary of state, who at the opening of the next session of the legislature shall report the same as the unfinished business after the organization of the legislature."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that the Clerk report the amendment again? I did not quite catch it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment again.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the chairman of the committee say whether he would object to a proposition that when a bill is introduced and passed by the legislature and held by the Governor General without signing it, and before the 10 days are up the legislature adjourns, and thus the law fails, which would be called a "pocket veto," whether he would object to saving that feature by making this the unfinished legislation at the opening of the next session? It can be made a matter of record so as to become the unfinished business at the opening of the next legislature. That is the idea we have in Ohio. Legislation fails by the pocket veto when the legislature adjourns short of 10 days. On the other hand, if the legislature was in session the proposition would become a law if the governor would hold it. We prevent that veto by making that the unfinished business to be taken up by the next legislature. In Ohio it is retained in the secretary of state's office until the next session of the legislature and by him passed over to that body. That is to prevent a governor pocketing a piece of legislation and killing it by virtue of the legislature adjourning within the 10 days.

Mr. HELM. What is the procedure at the reconvening of the next legislature?

Mr. FESS. First, they organize the legislature, and this is laid before them as unfinished business.

Mr. HELM. De novo?

Mr. FESS. It comes up as a matter of record. It is taken up as the unfinished business and acted upon for or against.

Mr. HELM. And you pass it again?

Mr. FESS. Yes; reenact it. It saves the loss of it by the governor just pocketing it.

Mr. HELM. Is it subject to amendment?

Mr. FESS. Certainly. It could come up originally as new matter, but in this way it does not have to be reintroduced. It is made a part of the record in the office of the secretary of state. The wording of the Ohio constitution is, if a bill shall not be returned by the governor within 10 days, Sundays excepted, it shall become a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the general assembly by adjournment prevents its return, in which case it shall become a law, unless within 10 days after such adjournment it shall be filed by him with his objections in writing in the office of secretary of state.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman addressed a question to me, as to whether or not I would be willing to accept the amendment he proposes. He says there is a similar provision in the constitution of the State of Ohio; but, if so, I know of no other State that has such a provision. The gentleman is aware of the fact, I suppose, that there is no such position in the Philippines as secretary of state?

Mr. FESS. I should have said the office corresponding to that of secretary of state. That would be the secretary of the interior, would it not?

Mr. JONES. I can not say.

Mr. FESS. I would modify that to suit the situation.

Mr. JONES. I do not know what the position would be, but I do not think that the amendment ought to be adopted. It is an experiment, to say the least of it. As I have already said, I do not know of any State except the State of Ohio which has such a provision.

Mr. FESS. It makes the pocket veto impossible.

Mr. JONES. Any bill failing to become law because of the so-called pocket veto could be reintroduced at the next session. I see no reason why such a bill should be made the continuing order.

Mr. FESS. It should be the executive secretary, I suppose, instead of the secretary of state.

Mr. JONES. So I would not be willing, Mr. Chairman, to accept the amendment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion in the latter part of the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia covered what I wanted to say, which was, in substance, this: That there is nothing to prevent the reintroduction of such a measure at the next session of the congress, or whatever it may be called, and its enactment. The only advantage I would see is that in effect it would become a special order and thereby hasten by a trifle its consideration.

Mr. FESS. The advantage is this, namely, that the governor would not likely put it in his pocket if he knew it was a continuing order and could be taken up at the next session. That is the main advantage. He would act upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 12, after the word "law," insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That the President of the United States shall approve or disapprove an act submitted to him under the provisions of this section within six months from and after its passage and submission for his approval, and if not approved within such time it shall become a law, the same as if it had been specifically approved."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the chairman of the committee indicate whether he is willing to accept this amendment or not?

Mr. JONES. I do not know of any special objection to it. I did not catch all of the language.

Mr. MILLER. It is the same as we adopted to the preceding paragraph, except that I notice the word "passage" is used there instead of "enactment."

Mr. JONES. I would be glad if the Clerk would report the amendment again and read it slowly, so that we can catch it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. JONES. It reads "if not disapproved within such time"?

Mr. MILLER. It is the same as the language of the preceding amendment that we adopted.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to change the word "passage" in the amendment to the word "enactment," so that the language would be the same at this point as at other points in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to modify the language of his amendment as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, in justice to myself I wish to make a short statement to the committee. I am not at all satisfied with the provision of this bill regarding the appointment and the tenure of office of senators and representatives for the non-Christians. I have not, however, taken any part in the debate upon this subject, because, knowing, as I think I do, the reasons why the majority of the Committee on Insular Affairs thought it necessary to write those provisions, I was inclined to believe that it is more expedient to let them stand as they are.

It is evident, from the little I know of the sentiments of the membership of this House, that the idea of having the so-called senators and representatives appointed by the executive is as much abhorrent to them as it is to me, and so it is to make the tenure of office of those senators and representatives dependent upon the will of the executive. But, as I understand it, there was this practical question to meet by those responsible for the framing of the bill: They were aware that one of the most debated features of the Philippine problem in this country is that of the administration and government of the non-Christian inhabitants of the archipelago So much has been said about the unfriendly relations between the Christians and non-Christians in the islands, incompetency of the former to deal with the latter, and other absurdities of this kind, that, unless some kind of peculiar provision was decided upon whereby a partial concession to that contention is made, this bill would have been assailed as unwise legislation, and perhaps it would have been insisted that the non-Christians should be left entirely out of the control of the Philippine Legislature. Why, Mr. Chairman, there has just been introduced an amendment to this bill creating a special commission, to be appointed by the President of the United States, vested with the exclusive power to legislate for the non-Christians.

There is another reason why I have not opposed this proposition upon this floor. As I understand it, this is only a temporary arrangement which the Philippine Legislature, with the approval of the Governor General, may, by enactment, change.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Is it the gentleman's position that he does not approve the provisions of this bill intended to meet the situation? Does the gentleman believe that the provisions in this bill as they stand are not such as best to meet the situation with respect to the non-Christian tribes?

Mr. QUEZON. The gentleman is correct. I do not really approve of these provisions; but, as I said, I take them for reasons of expediency and because the Philippine Legislature herein provided and organized, with the approval of the Governor General, is empowered to amend that part of the law. I ask the gentleman from Virginia if I am not right?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. QUEZON. So that the legislature can meet this question?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I just wanted to get the gentleman on record clearly; that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MILLER. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 0.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, have we finished that section?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

All laws enacted by the Philippine Legislature shall be reported to the Congress of the United States, which hereby reserves the power and authority to annul the same. If at the termination of any fiscal year the appropriations necessary for the support of government for the ensuing fiscal year shall not have been made, the several sums appropriated in the last appropriation bills for the objects and purposes therein specified, so far as the same may be done, shall be deemed to be reappropriated for the several objects and purposes specified in said last appropriation bill; and until the legislature shall act in such behalf the treasurer shall, when so directed by the Governor General, make the payments necessary for the purposes aforesaid.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first sentence of the paragraph, which reads as follows:

All laws enacted by the Philippine Legislature shall be reported to the Congress of the United States, which hereby reserves the power and authority to annul the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, lines 19, 20, and 21, strike out the following language: "All laws enacted by the Philippine Legislature shall be reported to the Congress of the United States, which hereby reserves the power and authority to annul the same."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, my main objection is to the reserve power of Congress at any time it sees fit, no matter how distant in the future after the enactment by the legislature, to annul some well-considered legislation that may even have been approved by the President of the United States.

In this bill we safeguard the interests of the Filipinos and the interests of the United States by reserving to the President the authority to veto all legislation relating to the tariff and revenue policy of the Philippine Islands, and also to their currency, and we further place a permissive veto power in the President's hands on all legislation that may be enacted by the legislature in reference to the forests, lands, and mining.

I assume that the committee, in singling out those subjects for special exception, considered that they were principal matters that should not become enacted into law without first being considered by the Philippine Legislature, by the Governor General, and then by the President of the United States.

To go to the further extreme and allow Congress at any time, without any limitation of time, to veto and annul all legislation, after perchance contract rights have become established, is, I think, going contrary to the spirit of this bill in seeking to vest in the Filipinos the right of self-government. I can not see wherein Congress should have that power, if we are safeguarding the interests of the Filipinos and also the interests of this Government wherein they are concerned, namely, in their tariff and currency system, or should go further than that. And, furthermore, I do not think that Congress is going to be concerned in passing upon that legislation after it passes the scrutiny of the President in the cases enumerated.

If it is the theory that the Congress should overlord the Government of the Philippines, well and good. We first appoint a Governor General whom we assume is capable. He is appointed by the President for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of the Filipinos; and then, in addition to that, we reserve to the President the absolute right to say that no tariff legislation and no currency legislation shall become law until approved by the President; and then, further, we reserve the qualifying veto that, if the legislation refers to forests, lands, or mines, the President may, within six months after its presentation to him, veto the same.

Mr. QUEZON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am very glad to yield to my friend.

Mr. QUEZON. Of course, I sympathize with every proposition that tends to give more power to the Philippine Legislature; but I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that after striking out of the bill that section the Congress will still have the power and the authority to annul the laws of the Philippine Legislature? In my opinion, Congress would still have that power.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, Congress is sovereign, but we are establishing in the organic act what shall be the policy of this Government. This provision is absolutely inconsistent with the other provisions of this law. We say to the Filipinos, "We are giving you some sort of autonomous government, at least so far as certain legislation is concerned," and then we are putting in here a qualifying clause that would nullify all that legislation at some time in the distant future. It is utterly in conflict with the theory of this bill.

Mr. QUEZON. I hope the gentleman will not misunderstand me. I do not want him to think, nor do I want to be put in the RECORD as not favoring the idea of letting the Philippine Legislature be untrammeled. I just want to be sure whether the gentleman thinks that if that section is stricken out Congress will no longer have the power to annul our laws.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Congress has the right at any time to change this law or to change the whole form of government in the Philippine Islands; but in the organic act itself we should not lay it down as a fundamental principle that we are intending to scrutinize and pass judgment on all the legislation that may be enacted by the Philippine Legislature. If I understand the purpose of this bill, it is that the Philippine Legislature shall be vested with absolute power in certain particulars to work out their own destiny. If they fail in that endeavor, then we will have to provide a substitute government; but the very idea of the gentleman is that they are fit for greater power than this bill confers. Why should we nullify the power we give them by proclaiming the idea that all the legislation that they pass shall be subject to the negativing power of Congress? It is not contemplated by any of us that we are going to pass upon their legislative acts.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Wisconsin seems to be very earnest about this.

Mr. STAFFORD. I certainly am.

Mr. JONES. I want to ask the gentleman if he was a Member of Congress 12 years ago.

Mr. STAFFORD. Unfortunately I was not.

Mr. JONES. I was going to say that if the gentleman was here he voted for a similar provision at that time as to Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands also.

Mr. STAFFORD. I came into Congress just after its enactment. But the fact that we passed a provision 12 years ago is not to say that to-day we ought to pass the same enactment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Filipinos have advanced under American guidance, by the aid of the Americans who have been sent there to educate them and instruct them in the art of government, until they have laid the foundations on which the Filipinos can build. When we took up the occupation 12 years ago they were new to government, but I hope that they are sufficiently advanced now—at least that is the contention of the gentleman from Virginia—so that we should give them some freedom, so that they may pass this legislation without having it submitted afterwards to the negative vote of Congress.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Has the gentleman time in two minutes to yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman think that Congress will have the power to make their enactments nugatory as long as the present relation between our Government and theirs continues to exist? Will not Congress continue to have that power if it chooses to exercise it?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but we should not lay down here a principle that is inconsistent with the other provisions of this bill. The fundamental principle of this bill is that we are giving to the Filipinos absolute power to pass legislation on certain matters. Then we reserve to the President and the Governor General certain veto powers. No legislation affecting the tariff or the currency shall become effective until it has been approved by the President. Their legislation affecting mines, lands, and forests may be reviewed and may be vetoed by the President, but as to the other legislation this bill says their action shall be absolute. Now, why put in this qualifying clause and say that Congress shall have the authority to negative all that legislation when we do not intend to exercise that power?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is a mere statement of fact. We have that power.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Wisconsin, in response to questions addressed to him by the Resident Commissioner [Mr. QUEZON] and by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], has admitted that, whether the language objected to by him is left in this bill or not, Congress will still have the right to annul any legislation passed by the Philippine Legislature. If that be so, it seems to me that the difference is just that between tweedledum and tweedledee. I can not understand how the gentleman can speak so earnestly upon a subject that he admits is of no practical moment. His position is that Congress undoubtedly has the power that is given in the bill, but that for some reason it should not declare that it possesses it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I take it that it should not be the declared policy of Congress when you are claiming that the Filipinos are after absolute independence.

Mr. JONES. I understand the gentleman to say that Congress can annul any act of the Philippine Legislature, but should not say that it can do so. I do not think there is any force in the gentleman's objection to the use of this language in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. In a moment. I will say to the gentleman that this has been the policy of this Government with reference to the Philippines as well as to Porto Rico ever since those countries have been given civil government. Unfortunately, Congress never takes any notice of any act that is reported to it.

I recall, Mr. Chairman, that I recently asked the House to give its consent to have printed certain acts of the Porto Rican Legislature, which, as is required by law, were certified to Congress. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objected on the ground that Congress never paid any attention to these acts. I must admit that there was much truth in what the gentleman said.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 20. That the qualified electors of the Philippine Islands shall, on the first Tuesday in June, 1915, and at the general elections thereafter provided for the election of senators and representatives to the Philippine Legislature, elect two Resident Commissioners to the United States, who shall be entitled to an official recognition as such by all departments upon presentation to the President of a certificate of election by the Governor General of said islands. Each of said Resident Commissioners shall, in addition to the salary and expenses now allowed by law, be allowed the same sum for stationery and for the pay of necessary clerk hire as is now allowed to the Members of the House of Representatives of the United States, to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and the franking privilege allowed by law to Members of Congress. No person shall be eligible to election as Resident Commissioner who is not a bona fide elector of said islands owing allegiance to the United States and who is not more than 30 years of age and who does not read and write the English language. The two Resident Commissioners elected in June, 1915, shall hold their office from the first Monday in the month of December following until the 4th of March, 1919, and the term of their successors shall be for four years, beginning from the 4th of March following their election. In case of vacancy in the position of Resident Commissioner caused by resignation or otherwise, the Governor General may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Philippine Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancy; but the Resident Commissioner thus elected shall hold office only for the unexpired portion of the term wherein the vacancy occurred.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting patiently all day, having in mind what the gentleman from Massachusetts said was the purpose of the minority, and that was to prevent abuses. I have seen hardly a Member present from New England this afternoon, and in order that we may get some of them in I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the gentleman is in error. There are a great many Members from New England here—the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], and a dozen others.

Mr. DONOVAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, rather than get into a controversy over it I will withdraw the point. But there is not a single Member from Illinois and hardly a Member from the Middle States. [Laughter.] There is only one from New York, and only one from the whole Pacific coast.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. I beg the gentleman's pardon. There are three or four right around him from New York.

Mr. DONOVAN. I was talking about the minority.

Mr. BRYAN. I take exception to the gentleman's remark about the Pacific coast. There are several here.

Mr. PAYNE. There are several Members from New York present on this side.

Mr. STAFFORD. And there are three here from Wisconsin, others from New York and Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER. And the majority is not represented by more than 15 Members.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; but think of the quality. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut withdraws his point of order.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I ask now to have my amendment to section 18, which was passed over some time ago, again reported as modified.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, what became of the point of order made by the gentleman from Connecticut?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdrew the point of order.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I compliment the State of Pennsylvania for having one Member present in order to ask a question, you are so seldom seen here.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, are amendments now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] has an amendment pending.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment as modified be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 18, line 11, page 14, insert a new section, as follows:

"The senators and representatives shall receive an annual compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law and paid out of the treasury of the Philippine Islands. The senators and representatives shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either house they shall not be questioned in any other place."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if he does not think his amendment should come in as another paragraph?

Mr. CLINE. Yes; Mr. Chairman, I ask to modify the amendment, so as to have it come in as an additional paragraph instead of an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment, so that it will come in as an additional paragraph. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana wish to discuss it?

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I am offering this amendment because I believe it is based upon the soundest public policy. The two branches of the Philippine Legislature constitute a coordinate branch with the other governmental forces of the islands. But the assembly and the senate, constituting the Philippine Legislature, coordinate with themselves. Consequently, all those rules and regulations in which each is vitally interested should be fixed in the organic act. It has been said that in formulating, as we are here, a law that shall be the basis of legislation in the Philippines, we can not expect to designate other than the important objects to be acomplished and that the minor ingredients that are involved in the important objects are proper subjects for legislation. This is undoubtedly true. When this amendment was proposed to our Constitution the matter was referred to what was known as a detail committee, of which Mr. Madison was a member. His understanding of the province of an organic act was not different than what I have stated. And yet he insisted that the language I propose now to insert into the Philippine act should be inserted in our Constitution. The question as to the extent that legislative bodies should go in writing a constitution has frequently been raised in considering this bill. In connection with that proposition I desire to quote the language of Chief Justice Marshall, used in the McCulloch case, Fourth Wheaton, page 407:

> A constitution to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit, and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution, would partake of the prolixity of a legal code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would probably never be understood by the public. Its nature, therefore, requires that only its great outline should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves.

Undoubtedly with that understanding of their duties in mind the framers of the Constitution still wrote the amendment that I present into the Constitution of the United States. Let me call the committee's attention to the fact that there is the strongest reciprocal relation expressed between the members of the Philippine Legislature and the people they represent. It is undoubtedly true that for the proper conduct of public business members of the Philippine Congress should be "privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and going to and from the same," and that each legislator should be free and without restraint to express his well-grounded opinion and conviction upon any subject before that body, and he should not be held to an account for his opinion or for his speech in any other place. The people likewise have rights to be protected. It should be embodied in the organic law that for treason, felony, or breach of the peace no legislator should be permitted to shelter himself under the legislative cover of his own enactment. As I said before, these rights are so reciprocal, so based upon sound public policy, that in the United States they have been engrafted in almost identical terms in nearly every State constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read a follows:

> Page 16, line 16, after the word "salary," strike out the words "and expenses," and on the same page, line 17, after the words "sum for," insert the words "mileage and."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I am as much inclined to be liberal with the members of congress of the Philippine Islands as any Member on the floor, but I question whether we ought to be more liberal with them than with ourselves. What the term "and expenses," in line 16, means I do not know. I do not know whether it is intended to include mileage or not. It is not so stated.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. It says "expenses now allowed by law." The law allows them $2,000 for expenses in lieu of regular mileage that we receive.

Mr. MOORE. Does that include mileage?

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is the mileage.

Mr. COOPER. That is the mileage.

Mr. MOORE. They are allowed $2.000 for mileage?

Mr. COOPER. It is in lieu of mileage, and they also have a secretary.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the section proposes to give to each of the members in addition to the salary and expenses now allowed by law the same sum for stationery and pay of necessary clerk hire as is now paid Members of the House of Representatives of the United States. That does not appear to include mileage.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Instead of allowing the Philippine Commissioners the mileage based upon distance, the Congress has allowed them a limited sum for mileage of $2,000, and this provision carries that into the law.

Mr. MOORE. Is it the gentleman's understanding that $2,000 covers their entire pay and also their mileage and expenses?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; it covers merely their mileage allowance for traveling from the Philippines here and back.

Mr. MOORE Oh, this is for the Philippine Commissioners to the United States?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; the two Resident Commissioners who represent the Philippines in the Congress.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In addition to their salary as Commissioners, and in addition to the $2,000 which is given them in lieu of mileage on the distance basis, they are allowed by this provision clerk hire and stationery.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offered this amendment under a misapprehension, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee to interpret the phrase "bona fide elector of said islands, owing allegiance to the United States, and who is not more than 30 years of age," which occurs in lines 22, 23, 24, and 25, on page 16. What is the legal evidence of that status—"owing allegiance to the United States"?

Mr. MILLER. In other words, does it refer to the islands or to the Commissioners?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. And if it refers to the Commissioners, just what condition of allegiance?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any difficulty about that. There has been some question heretofore as to the use of the words "bona fide." I think the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] or some gentleman on that side suggested the word "actual" in lieu of the words bona fide.

Mr. MILLER. That was simply because the word "actual" had previously been used in the bill.

Mr. JONES. I said at that time that I did not understand that there was any difference between the word "actual" and the words "bona fide" as they were used. Of course, owing allegiance to the United States applies to the Resident Commissioners and not to the islands. The language is plain, and I will read it:

> No person shall be eligible to election as Resident Commissioner who is not a bona fide elector of said islands owing allegiance to the United States and who is not more than 30 years of age.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman can readily see that any construction of that language suggests that "owing" refers to the islands fully as much as to the Commissioners, and possibly more.

Mr. JONES. If that were true it would make no difference, but it can not be true.

Mr. QUEZON. That is copied from the old law.

Mr. MILLER. Even though the old law made a mistake, we do not want to repeat it here.

Mr. JONES. As has been suggested, this language is an exact copy of the law passed by Congress 12 years ago and for which the gentleman's party is responsible.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JONES. Therefore, I may refer the gentleman's question to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], who was chairman of the committee at that time.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Wisconsin has just left the Chamber.

Mr. MILLER. "No person shall be eligible to election as Resident Commissioner," assuming that the construction of the chairman of the committee is correct, "who is not a bona fide elector of said island and who does not owe allegiance to the United States." Now, that would make it clearer, as far as the language is concerned.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The question the gentleman suggests is a differentiation in his mind between "islands" and "persons."

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Clearly that differentiation is proper. The word "islands," as used in this relation, undoubtedly means the physical land which is there. That being the case, you could not have land owing allegiance. The land could not owe allegiance to the United States. It is nothing but the individual who could owe allegiance.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman can offer a very excellent argument on that hypothesis, but the language is "islands owing allegiance to the United States," and I can readily conceive how that phraseology may mean territory from which the man comes is part of territory owing allegiance to the people of the United States.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that I have the organic law in my hand. It provides:

That no person shall be eligible at such election who is not a qualified elector of said islands owing allegiance to the United States, and who is not 30 years of age.

That has been the law for the past 12 years, and there has never been any confusion or question about it, and it seems to me——

Mr. MILLER. It is not that which bothers me. I am willing to accede to the gentleman's construction that the word "owing" refers to the commissioner and not to the islands; but let us see where that leaves us. Now, just exactly what qualification must a Resident Commissioner enjoy that will enable him to comply with these requirements; that is, what must he do to owe allegiance to the United States?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. He does not have to do anything. If he is a resident and citizen of the islands, he does owe allegiance to the United States.

Mr. MILLER. Is the gentleman quite sure about that?

Mr. QUEZON. Unless he is in actual rebellion.

Mr. MILLER. Does he owe allegiance to the Philippine Government?

Mr. JONES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman owe allegiance to the United States Government?

Mr. MILLER. I certainly do.

Mr. JONES. What does the gentleman have to do to show that?

Mr. MILLER. I have taken the oath of office, for one thing, in which I state that I do.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from the Philippines also has to take an oath of office.

Mr. MILLER. That is after he has been elected, but this says "no person shall be eligible."

Mr. JONES. There is no difference between the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from the Philippines in that respect.

Mr. MILLER. But this says that no person shall be eligible to the office. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. In line 23 the differentiation there is "who is not a bona fide elector." In line 24, "who is not more than 30 years of age." Line 25, "who does not read and write." You have the expression very clearly in the three lines. Now, instead of saying "allegiance," why not insert "and who does acknowledge allegiance to the United States"?

Mr. MILLER. I think that would be a decided improvement.

Mr. FESS. You have a rhetorical sentence, and one that can not have any ambiguity in it.

Mr. MILLER. I think that would be a decided improvement, but I think there may be some technical difficulty in this language requiring the Resident Commissioner to owe allegiance to two sovereignties. We will assume the sovereignty of the United States extends over the islands, and to that extent he can owe allegiance to the United States and be a Filipino.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Ohio for a moment and ask him to read again, so that the gentleman from Virginia may hear it, the change in the language that he suggests, and which I believe does make a much simpler and clearer sentence.

Mr. JONES. I do not understand that there is anything before the committee.

Mr. SLAYDEN. There was an amendment offered, I understood.

Mr. FESS. The language I suggested would be "and who does not acknowledge," so it would read:

No person shall be eligible to election as Resident Commissioner who is not a bona fide elector of said islands and who does not acknowledge allegiance to the United States, and who is not more than 30 years of age, and who does not read and write—

And so on.

Mr. JONES. Let me see in just what line it is.

Mr. FESS. It comes after the word "islands," in line 23. Strike out the word "owing," in line 23, and insert "who does not acknowledge."

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to adjourn. There does not seem to be any business going on here.

Mr. SLAYDEN. We are trying to agree on the phrasing of an amendment.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to offer an amendment, so that there would be something pending.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] offered an amendment. I yield the floor now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] offered an amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I meant to offer an amendment that, after the word "islands," on page 16, line 23, strike out the word "owing" and insert in lieu thereof the words "and who does not acknowledge."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 23, after the word "islands," strike out the word "owing" and insert in lieu thereof the words "and who does not acknowledge."

So that the amended lines will read:

No person shall be eligible to election as Resident Commissioner who is not a bona fide elector of said islands and who does not acknowledge allegiance to the United States.

Mr. JONES. What was the language as last modified, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman would be willing to put it in this language, "who does not owe allegiance."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I accept it. The word "acknowledge" does not necessitate going to court.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, will the chairman of the committee kindly take us into his confidence and inform us when he intends to move that the committee rise?

Mr. JONES. We have gone so slowly on this bill that I would like to get along a little further before I make the motion.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are several amendments to this section, and as 5 o'clock is the usual rising hour——

Mr. JONES. Let us offer the amendments to this section, anyhow.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] to modify his amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 6, on page 17, the word "four" and insert the word "six" in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 6, strike out the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "six."

Mr. TOWNER. I will not take any time, Mr. Chairman, in discussing it. The gentleman understands the necessity for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think it is a serious question that is involved in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, as to whether we should lengthen the term of the Resident Commissioners, which is now two years, to six years.

Mr. JONES. It is now four years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Four years as provided in this bill and under existing law?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was under a misapprehension. Even then it is quite questionable whether the same persons, without any right of recall, should be serving in this Chamber for the lengthy period of a six-year term. I know the difficulty that is confronting the chairman and the members of the committee. You have provided for triennial elections, and therefore you would have a hiatus if you provided merely for four years.

Mr. JONES. I was about to ask the gentleman if he was present when we had the discussion over it a day or two ago.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have been present at all times during the consideration of this important bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I was willing and the Commissioner from the Philippines was perfectly willing to reduce it to three years, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] pointed out that that would not correspond with our terms here, and you have either got to reduce it to two years——

Mr. STAFFORD. You can not make it two.

Mr. JONES. You have either got to put it at six years or make some other change. To leave the term at four years will necessitate the holding of an additional election throughout the islands.

Mr. STAFFORD. It seemed to me that the period was very long for the Philippines to be represented in this body at one time by the same persons without opportunity for a change.

Mr. JONES. I agree with the gentleman about that, but there does not seem to be any other practical way of settling it.

Mr. STAFFORD. When the question was last under consideration the gentleman from Virginia recognized the difficulty that was pointed out by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I did not know that he had since considered it. But if he has since considered it and thinks it is impossible of correction, of course we are confronted with a condition that has to be met.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make this suggestion to the gentleman, that there is nothing in this law regarding the election of Resident Commissioners which provides that they should have seats in this body, nor was there anything in the original law; and so far as I know it was not necessarily in contemplation, at the time the Resident Commissioners were provided for in this organic act, that they should have seats in the Congress. The great bulk of the duties of Resident Commissioners lies elsewhere than in this body, and there is no provision in the rules of the House now that gives the Resident Commissioners seats on the floor of the House. The custom is at the beginning of each Congress to introduce a resolution to the effect that during that Congress they should be admitted to seats in the House and be permitted to participate in the debates. So there will be no danger, I think, about the question of the length of their terms. The great bulk of their duties is not here at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. On second thought, Mr. Chairman, Congress is surrendering, so far as legislation is concerned, its right over many matters and transferring it to the Philippine Legislature as provided for in this bill, and therefore I see that we have a practical condition to meet, and I shall not oppose the amendment.

But in that connection I would like to inquire if the gentleman does not want to follow that up with another amendment, to change the dates here as to when the terms of these Commissioners shall begin and expire? I direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that there are some dates predicated upon a four-year term of office, and ask if that will not have to be changed if we lengthen the time to six years?

Mr. JONES. I do not know of any dates that would have to be changed. The term of office would begin on the 4th day of March following their election. They would be elected in June.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me read to the gentleman:

The Resident Commissioners elected in June, 1915, shall hold their office from the first Monday in the month of December following until the 4th of March, 1919.

That would be for a four-year term. There would be no election at that time, and the term of their successors is to be six years, beginning with the 4th of March following their election. If you follow that up, you will find that there will be no election held in the year following March 4, 1919. That will have to be corrected. I do not know whether you have given consideration to that or not.

Mr. JONES. That would be "1921," I suppose. The other amendment has not been adopted yet, has it, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is pending, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment: Page 17, line 5, strike out "nineteen" and substitute for it the word "twenty-one."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 5, strike out the word "nineteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-one."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to present some resolutions.

The CHAIRMAN. In just a moment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a copy of resolutions passed by the Ocala Board of Trade with reference to river and harbor matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Ocala, Fla., as to river and harbor improvements.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, we did not hear the gentleman here.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I asked unanimous consent to print in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Ocala with reference to rivers and harbors. They are very short.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 22. That, except as provided otherwise in this act, the executive departments of the Philippine Government shall continue as now authorized by law until otherwise provided by the Philippine Legislature. When the Philippine Legislature herein provided shall convene and organize, the Philippine Commission, as such, shall cease and determine and the members thereof, except the Governor General and heads of executive departments, shall vacate their offices as members of said commission. The Philippine Legislature may thereafter by appropriate legislation increase the number or abolish any of the executive departments, or make such changes in the names and duties thereof as it may see fit, and shall provide for the appointment and removal of the heads of the executive departments by the Governor General, and may provide that heads of executive departments shall have seats in either or both houses of the legislature, with the right of debating or voting or both: Provided, That all executive functions of the Government must be directly under the Governor General or within one of the executive departments under the supervision and control of the Governor General. There shall be established by the Philippine Legislature a bureau, to be known as the bureau of non-Christian tribes, which said bureau shall be embraced in one of the executive departments to be designated by the Governor General, and shall have general supervision over the public affairs of the inhabitants of the territory represented in the legislature by appointive senators and representatives.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to submit to this paragraph, but I think it would be better to submit it to-morrow; and I am willing that the gentleman from Virginia should move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FOSTER, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. SELDOMRIDGE, for three weeks, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. WATSON, for two days, on account of sickness in family.

CHANGE OF CONFEREES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, October 13, 1914.

(Legislative day of Thursday, October 8, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE COTTON SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to present to the Senate this morning a few telegrams and two or three letters. I can, of course, read them myself, but I would prefer to send them to the desk and let the Secretary read them. The first is a telegram from the president of the State Bankers' Association of Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

AMERICUS, GA., October 12, 1914.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

If possible hold Congress in session until some action is taken to provide some relief for the people of the cotton-growing States. The cotton market is now flat and approaching the 5-cent-per-pound level in the interior, with the demand very limited. Imperative something be done. It appears that the governors and legislators of the cotton States can not agree or unite on any plan for relief. The interest of the entire country involved in the threatened disaster to the South. You fully realize the gravity of the situation, and I feel sure will exercise your every effort to obtain relief.

L. G. COUNCIL,
President Georgia Bankers' Association.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The next telegram I send to the desk is from the editor of the Ruralist, an agricultural paper with a circulation of something like 250,000 subscribers. He is a man of conservatism, and a scholar.

The Secretary read as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., October 12, 1914.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Just returned from extended trip over cotton section. Conditions are infinitely worse than press finds expedient to publish. We all fear that unless relief comes through national or United States action horrible conditions will soon develop. Am leaving to-night for Fort Worth, Tex., to attend farmers' national congress in hope of lining up concerted effort.

H. E. STOCKBRIDGE.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The next telegram is from a well-informed resident of a rural section.

The Secretary read as follows:

CALHOUN, GA., October 12, 1914.

Senator HOKE SMITH, Washington, D. C.:

Banks having to push collection. Farmers being compelled to sacrifice their cotton around 6 cents. This spells ruin to many and honest, hard-working families. Many women and children in the South will suffer the coming winter for lack of food and clothing, although no fault of theirs, a guarantee reduction of next year's crop will put price where people can live. Act before it is too late. Quick action is what the South desires and wants. Please hand to President Wilson.

Your friend,

P. M. BOAZ.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD two short letters from farmers. They present the case as it affects the farmer and the tenant farmer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters referred to are as follows:

LUTHERSVILLE, GA., October 9, 1914.

Hon HOKE SMITH.

DEAR FRIEND: Several of my friends have asked me to write you in regard to cotton. Now, you see our condition: We have gone ahead and bought everything this year at a high price; you know, everything was based on 13-cent cotton; now the guano men want us to sell our cotton and pay the money for our guano. Now, cotton is selling for 6½ cents for grade 4 to-day. Now, my guano account this year is $252.90, so, at 6½ cents for cotton, it will take about eight bales to pay this account. Now, if cotton was selling for 13 cents, like it was when I bought the guano, it would only take about four bales at 13 cents. So it is with everything the farmer bought this year; so when you begin to think about the farmer, he is in bad luck. Now, you see, we farmers depend on our cotton for our money. Now, you see, they are just giving us half price for our cotton; so, you know, if our cotton don't pay our debts, they will take everything the farmer has. You know, they can take the last grain of corn, fodder, and everything that way; the last cow and hog. You know the law gives them that authority. I know the law gives the farmer a chance to bankrupt and homestead; but it is this way with the farmer: Now, if the farmer has got to go to the devil to save his stuff, the farmer had rather see the other fellow take the stuff. I hope it will be so you good men can protect us farmers at once, for we need help at once. The farmers have lost hope, so they are turning their cotton over at these ungodly prices.

Your friend,

LUTHER KEITH.

LYERLY, GA., October 10, 1914.

Hon. HOKE SMITH, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I received your speech. I tell you, unless something is done to help out the cotton farmer, and that soon, it need not be done at all, for if this cotton crop has to be sacrificed at present prices, the poor tenant farmer is ruined and can not go on to make another crop, but will be compelled to go to something else to support his wife and children. But it seems, now, to me if something is not done soon we are ruined here. Our debts are coming due, and we have no money to pay them with, and our only hope was our cotton. We haven't the money to pay our taxes on our homes. We can't pay our fertilizer bill nor any other debt. We can sacrifice the cotton, but still the debts are left unpaid, and the tax man will soon be closing out on us for taxes, and for our guano the companies want their money, and our notes for the fertilizer are due the 15th of this month. I can't see how we are to do, but hope some plan will come to our aid that will save us from bankruptcy.

Your friend, G. A. RAGLAND, Sr.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, Mr. President, I desire to present to the Senate a letter from Mr. Charles W. Macara, president of the International Federation of Master Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Associations. I do not ask to have it read. My desire is that it may be embraced in the RECORD, for the information of Senators and those interested.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COTTON INDUSTRY—PLEA FOR RESERVES OF CROP.

15 CROSS STREET, MANCHESTER, September 19.

To the Editor of the Textile Mercury.

SIR: No industry has been more seriously affected by the war than the cotton industry, and, although everything possible has been done to keep the mills running, yet we are still confronted with the serious problem of how the great population which finds its employment in the spinning and manufacturing of cotton can be kept at work.

This industry, as is well known, is very largely an over-sea industry, all its raw material being imported, and more than three-quarters of the production of the spindles and looms being exported. The great difficulties that have to be grappled with at the present time will be readily realized.

One of these difficulties arises from the overplus of cotton consequent upon the partial or complete stoppage of the cotton mills on the European Continent. For years past I have been advocating the establishment of cotton reserves, and now is the time to put this suggestion into operation. Unless something of this kind is done I fear the outlook for everyone engaged in the growing and manufacturing of cotton is very serious indeed. For years the cotton industry of the world has been requiring more and more cotton, and the mills for its manufacture have been increased in excess of both the raw material and labor available. Much propaganda work has been carried on since the International Cotton Federation was founded 10 years ago to improve the yield of the existing fields, and to open up new ones in any part of the world where it can be done successfully.

I have always viewed with misgiving the possibility of circumstances arising in connection with exceptionally large yields of cotton—or with such a condition as has arisen now—which would seriously affect the interests of the growers of cotton and so discourage them in their work. The cotton plant is subject to many vicissitudes, and from that standpoint I have always urged that, if possible, a reserve should be created in times of plenty, for, unlike most other agricultural products, cotton suffers no deterioration if properly packed and stored. This problem is one of such magnitude and of such importance to so many millions of people that it ought to be coped with in a broad and statesmanlike manner. I see no way of dealing with it except by Government action.

It is impossible to lose sight of the fact that, owing to the great destruction of foodstuffs, it might be necessary to extend their production considerably, and this is a factor which will have to be considered in the planting of the next season's crops.

In conclusion, I would say that until a stable price for the raw material is assured there will be an absence of confidence, which must of necessity have a serious effect upon the running of the mills and the employment of the operatives. Everything that can be done must be done to restore this confidence.

I am, yours, faithfully,

CHARLES W. MACARA,
President International Federation of Master Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Association.

Senator JAMES MARTINE,
Washington, D. C.:

The bill before Congress places a tax on proprietary medicines and drugs. Please do your utmost to have the tax eliminated.

A. TEIFELD.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I desire to present a protest against the imposition of a tax on patent medicines, and ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, October 8, 1914.

Senator JAMES A. O'GORMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We inclose herewith a copy of a petition from the drug-trade section respecting the levy of a stamp tax upon medicines as proposed under the pending war-revenue bill.

We ask your careful consideration of the facts set forth in the petition, and express the hope that you will lend your influence to the effort to avoid the inequity and injustice which the proposed tax on medicines would impose.

We request that you will kindly present the petition to the Senate.

Very respectfully, yours,

WM. F. MCCONNELL,
Secretary Drug Trade Section
New York Board of Trade and Transportation.

NEW YORK, October 7, 1914.

To the Congress of the United States:

The drug-trade section of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, representing the wholesale drug and chemical trades, manufacturing pharmacists, and importers of drugs and chemicals, earnestly petitions Congress to omit from the pending war-revenue bill any additional tax upon medicines.

As American business men we are willing to contribute our proportionate share of any tax whenever conditions make the same absolutely necessary, but we protest that a stamp tax upon medicines is a double tax upon the druggist, and will be paid by the retailer in addition to the increased tax upon alcohol which will be required under the pending bill. Manufacturers usually protect themselves by increasing wholesale prices to cover the amount of such tax, whereas competition and fixed prices preclude any advance by the retailer. The tax proposed, therefore, is not distributed upon the whole commercial world, but is literally class legislation, burdening with special tax citizens who already pay large internal-revenue taxes and State license fees. Former experience proves that the actual income from such stamp tax is out of proportion to the cost and management of collection.

Very respectfully submitted.

DRUG TRADE SECTION OF THE

LABELING, ETC., OF MANUFACTURED PRODUCTS.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask unanimous consent to submit a favorable report from the Committee on Manufactures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be received.

Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on Manufactures, to which was referred the bill (S. 646) providing for labeling and tagging of all fabrics and articles of clothing intended for sale which enter into interstate commerce and providing penalties for misbranding, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 818) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey (by request):

A bill (S. 6633) authorizing Government control of certain utilities; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. OLIVER:

A bill (S. 6634) granting a pension to Anna Minette Snively (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 6635) granting an increase of pension to Margaret P. Sherman (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. VARDAMAN:

A bill (S. 6636) for the relief of the heirs of James Spiars (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 6637) to increase the limit of cost of the Federal building authorized at Longview, Tex.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

INCOME-TAX COLLECTIONS.

Mr. JONES. On behalf of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] I submit a Senate resolution and ask for its consideration. I do not think there will be any objection to it.

The resolution (S. Res. 471) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby directed to furnish to the Senate, without delay, the amount of revenue derived from the income tax, same to be classified by States, for the last fiscal year.

STORAGE OF RAW SUGAR.

Mr. THOMAS. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read and lie over until to-morrow.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 472), as follows:

Whereas it is announced that immense quantities of raw sugar are being held in storage in New York and Philadelphia in the expectation that Great Britain and France will be strong competitors for Cuban sugar in the near future, and that the price of raw sugar will reach such a figure that the refined product in January and February may go to 15 cents a pound, which is the equivalent of a consumption tax of 10 cents a pound upon a necessity of life aggregating more than five hundred millions of dollars per annum; and

Whereas this purpose, if it exists, constitutes a violation of the laws, both of the Nation and the States, and should be both prevented and punished: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, directed to make immediate investigation into the facts relating to the proposed engrossment of raw sugar as stated by the press, and report the result thereof to the Senate as soon as the same can be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over and be printed.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. I know something of the address the Senator from North Dakota is about to deliver, and I should like to have the Senate hear it. I think it would be of advantage.

Mr. GRONNA. I hope the Senator from Kansas will not call for a quorum. Time is very valuable now, and I can go on with my speech. It will not take over three-quarters of an hour or possibly an hour.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator objects, I will not raise the point, but I would like to have a good attendance of the Senate to hear what the Senator has to say.

Mr. GRONNA. I prefer to go on, if the Senator will allow me. I take it that there will not be a great many Members present anyway. We generally have to speak to empty seats nowadays. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Kansas, however.

Mr. President, we have been asked to pass a bill providing for additional revenue, a bill to impose additional taxes on the American people, in order to provide sufficient funds for the operation of the Government during the present fiscal year. The President, in his address to Congress on this subject, stated that this is necessary because of conditions which no man foresaw. He said:

> During the month of August there was, as compared with the corresponding month of last year, a falling off of $10,629,538 in the revenues collected from customs. A continuation of this decrease in the same proportion throughout the current fiscal year would probably mean a loss of customs revenues of from sixty to one hundred millions.
> The Treasury itself could get along for a considerable period, no doubt, without immediate resort to new sources of taxation. But at what cost to the business of the community? Approximately $75,000,000, a large part of the present Treasury balance, is now on deposit with national banks distributed throughout the country. It is deposited, of course, on call. I need not point out to you what the probable consequences of inconvenience and distress and confusion would be if the diminishing income of the Treasury should make it necessary rapidly to withdraw these deposits. * * *
> And we ought not to borrow. We ought to resort to taxation, however we may regret the necessity of putting additional temporary burdens on our people. To sell bonds would be to make a most untimely and unjustifiable demand on the money market; untimely, because this is manifestly not the time to withdraw working capital from other uses to pay the Government's bills; unjustifiable, because unnecessary. The country is able to pay any just and reasonable taxes without distress.

Mr. President, there are a few features of the situation to which I wish to call attention. The President's statement is to the effect that the customs revenues collected during the month of August were about ten and a half millions less than during the month of August, 1913, and therefore it is estimated that there will be a deficiency of from sixty to one hundred millions in customs revenues during the current fiscal year. As a matter of fact, what the President undoubtedly had in mind were the total revenues collected during the month of August, as the customs revenues during that month were about eleven and a half millions less than for the corresponding month last year, and the amount stated by the President is the difference between the total revenues collected during August. However, the President did not call attention to the fact that the customs revenues in August, 1913, were collected under the Payne Tariff Act, and that even in normal times the customs revenues would have been less than in August, 1913. It was estimated when the Underwood Tariff Act was passed that the revenues from customs duties would be about $70,000,000 a year less than under the Payne Act, and to make up for this deficiency provision was made for an income tax.

The fact that the falling off in customs revenues is not wholly due to the war, as a casual reader of the President's statement might infer, becomes apparent when we compare the imports during the two months. In August, 1913, the total imports, free and dutiable, were $137,651,553, while in August, 1914, they were $129,399,496, or $8,252,057 less. The decrease in customs revenues amounted to, in round numbers, $11,500,000. The customs duties collected during the two months were $30,934,952 and $19,431,362, respectively. Even if the value of the imports in August, 1914, had been equal to that of the imports in August, 1913, the customs revenue—taking the rate of duty collected to be 14.3 per cent, which is about what it averaged from the 1st of October last year to the 31st of July this year—would have been approximately $19,685,000, or only about $250,000 more than was actually collected. As the effect of the Underwood Tariff Act has been to increase the imports, however, it may be fairer to compare the receipts for August with those of July. The customs revenues in July, 1914, were $22,988,465 as against $19,431,362 in August, or a falling off of $3,457,003. The customs revenues collected during September were somewhat over $17,000,000, as against $26,794,494 in September, 1913. But, again, it must be evident that the greater part of the falling off is due to the reduction of rates of duty rather than to a falling off of imports.

While the customs duties collected during last August were $11,500,000 less than in August, 1913, and during September $9,700,000 less than in September, 1913, the same is not true of the total revenues of the Government. Because of increased internal revenues collected the total revenues for August were only $10,500,000 less than in August, 1913, and for September only $4,100,000 less than for the corresponding month in 1913. I want Senators to note this: For the first quarter—July, August, and September—of the present fiscal year the total revenues were only about $1,600,000 less than for the same quarter last fiscal year. I am speaking now of the total revenues of the Government.

However, if we consider the difference between the customs revenues for July and August, it appears to me that we may have something on which to base an estimate as to how much effect the condition of war in Europe is likely to have on our revenues. This difference was $3,457,103. A like difference for the nine months remaining of this fiscal year would amount to somewhat over $30,000,000. It would probably be considerably more than this, as the August receipts have in former years usually been from two to three millions greater than those for July, and also because of the fact that during last August part of the receipts was undoubtedly due to the withdrawal from bond of goods previously imported. Even after making allowance for these factors, however, it is obvious that the decrease in customs revenues due to the war will be far less than the $110,000,000 which we are asked to raise by these additional taxes. And when we consider that the surplus of ordinary receipts over ordinary expenditures for the fiscal year ended last June is given as $34,000,000, and that the income tax this year is expected to produce some $10,000,000 more than last year, and that an increase of several millions is expected in the internal-revenue receipts, the conclusion is forced upon us that the real reason for levying these additional taxes is not the falling off in revenues due to the European war.

The real reason for levying these additional taxes we find when we consider the total of appropriations for the present session. According to the statement submitted by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House, the total of appropriations for the present fiscal year is $1,089,000,000, while for last year it was $1,057,000,000, in both cases exclusive of rivers and harbors appropriations, as this bill had not become a law at the time the statement was made. According to these figures, the appropriations for this year were $32,000,000 greater than for last year. Democratic extravagance is greater than this would indicate, however, because there is a decrease in pensions of $11,150,000, due to the diminishing number of pensioners, and the appropriation for the Panama Canal is some $10,000,000 less. If we add these amounts to the above excess, we have $53,000,000. If we include the rivers and harbors bill, this amount will be decreased somewhat, since the strenuous fight made by Senators on this side of the Chamber resulted in reducing the amount carried in the rivers and harbors bill to $20,000,000. Last winter, however, we passed a law authorizing the construction of the Alaskan railway at a cost of $35,000,000, which sum is not included in the above figures. It is also reported that the word has gone forth from the White House that when Congress reassembles in December it must pass the bill providing for the purchase of merchant vessels by the Government, which means another appropriation of $30,000,000. If the treaty with Colombia should be ratified, that would mean $25,000,000 more. Another item which has not been included consists of the $6,000,000 which it has been necessary to appropriate because of the conditions in Europe. Excluding all these items, however, it is interesting to compare the total appropriations for this year with those for the four preceding years. The figures, given by the ranking minority member of the House Committee on Appropriations, are as follows:

Total appropriations.

Fiscal year:
1911	$978,521,087.68
1912	995,799,462.72
1913	988,353,340.41

These figures do not include the amounts carried by rivers and harbors appropriation bills; and in comparing them it should also be taken into account that the Panama appropriations for the present fiscal year are only about $21,000,000, while in former years they have been much higher, in one year reaching $48,000,000. In the 1912 campaign, as well as in former campaigns, the Democrats charged the Republicans with unconscionable extravagance in making appropriations, and yet this year the appropriations are $100,000,000 greater than those made in 1912.

If the appropriations this year had been kept down to the same figures as in former years, there would have been no necessity of imposing any more taxes.

I must further say that I do not agree with the President in the position he takes on the matter of the Government funds on deposit in the banks. In former years Republican administrations have been severely criticized by our Democratic friends because of the practice of making large deposits in the banks in the fall during the crop-moving season, for the purpose of relieving the stringency caused by the unusually large demand for currency. Our Democratic friends have maintained that there has been no need of such deposits, and that they have been made only as a favor to the banks receiving them. Without stopping to discuss that question, I will say that it has been the practice to withdraw such deposits later in the year, when the exceptional demand for currency had spent itself. Now we are told, however, that the $75,000,000 which the Government has in the banks must be left there, not only during the time of moving the crops but that it must not be withdrawn at all. If former administrations deserved to be criticized for making these deposits at times when there was a demand for additional supplies of currency, what about this administration, which insists that these deposits must remain in the banks even after the exceptional demand for currency is past, and in spite of the fact that the Government needs the money? Can it be maintained that conditions are such that it is necessary for us to impose additional taxes on ourselves in order that the banks may have this money? It can not be maintained that it is necessary to let these deposits remain in the banks in order to supply a demand for additional currency, as was the case under former administrations, since under the modified Aldrich-Vreeland Act the banks have had no difficulty in securing the issuance of currency in large amounts. I understand about $350,000,000 in this kind of currency has already been issued, and a large amount is still available. There may, of course, be certain banks, or certain classes of banks, which have secured currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act to the extent possible under the act, and which would be aided by being allowed to retain Government deposits, but if such is the case I do not believe that is sufficient reason for increasing our taxes rather than withdrawing these deposits. While I do not question that the President was actuated by the highest motives in making this recommendation, and believed that the course recommended would be conducive to the welfare of the people, I do not believe that we should extend this favor to a special class. We are not at war; the great struggle in Europe affects us only indirectly. In the countries that are engaged in this struggle, I believe, the banks are called upon to aid the Governments in financing the war; in this country we are told that at this juncture the Government should aid the banks, even if it is necessary to levy additional taxes in order to do so.

If the banks in those other countries are able not only to carry their own burdens but also to assume part of the Government's, why should not our banks carry their own? I am inclined to believe that it would inconvenience the banks far less to repay the $75,000,000 to the Treasury, and that it would disturb business less than it will to raise the amount proposed by new forms of taxation. And while I do not favor the issuance of bonds, because such action would add to the burdens of future generations, I do not see that raising the money by taxation will avoid the difficulty which the President raises to a bond issue, namely, that it will withdraw working capital from other uses. If selling bonds withdraws capital from other uses, so does taking that capital by taxation, although in the latter case the withdrawal may be more gradual. Wealth, generally speaking, is used either to produce more wealth, when we call it capital, or it is used for living expenses. Taxation must take it from one or the other of these classes. If taken from the former, the amount of working capital is reduced; if from the latter, more or less of a hardship is imposed depending on to what extent the things taxed are necessaries.

It is instructive in this connection to read the declaration contained in the Democratic platform of 1912 on the subject of Government expenditures. The platform says:

> We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil. We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

How does the performance of the present Congress square with this platform declaration? What becomes of the economy which it was promised would be practiced? How many "useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people," have been abolished? If the appropriations of Republican Congresses were lavish, how would you characterize those of the present session, which exceed the ones so severely criticized by $100,000,000 or more? If taxation was burdensome under Republican administrations, are they going to be lighter under this administration when it is necessary, to invent new forms of taxation? If the able chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, in pleading for economy last spring, referred to the appropriations made this session as a horrible mess, how would he characterize them now with the threatened deficiency in revenue? And it is not necessary for me to remind you that the deficiency would have been still greater but for the fight made by Republican Senators to cut down the amount carried by the rivers and harbors bill, which was, I believe, to the amount of $33,000,000. If the record of this session is indicative of what Democratic economy is, I trust we may be delivered from ever having Democratic extravagance.

While the Democratic Party has signally failed to fulfill its promise to reduce governmental expenditures, this is not the only instance in which the promise of the platform and the performance have not tallied. The 1912 Democratic platform had a plank charging that the high cost of living was in a large measure due to the protective tariff and promising to reduce the tariff so as to reduce the high cost of living. The tariff was lowered, but has the cost of living been reduced? I do not believe anyone will maintain that it has. One thing that has been reduced, however, is the income of a good many people. When the tariff measure was before Congress I pointed out the discrimination against the American farmer which it contained. As shown by the table submitted by my colleague, Mr. McCUMBER, the other day, out of 22 important agricultural products of the Northwest 17 were placed on the free list and the duties on others were reduced not less than 60 per cent. There is no justification for this discrimination against the farmer in the enactment of tariff laws. The farmer has not enjoyed excessive profits on his products nor has he attempted to form oppressive trusts. Nor has the removal of the duties on farm products, although admitting the agricultural products of other countries in competition with the products of the American farmer, benefited the consumer of them. There are some who justify it on the assumption that the Underwood tariff bill is a step toward free trade and that it was necessary to begin somewhere to remove the duties; the farmer was presumably selected on the supposition that he would be an uncomplaining victim. As to whether the ultimate aim is free trade, the Democratic platform is silent. I will quote to you, however, words from a source at present more potent than the Democratic platform. On page 156 of the New Freedom, the latest book by Woodrow Wilson, I find the following:

> Let me repeat: There can not be free trade in the United States so long as the established fiscal policy of the Federal Government is maintained. The Federal Government has chosen throughout all the generations that have preceded us to maintain itself chiefly on indirect instead of direct taxation. I dare say we shall never see a time when it can alter that policy in any substantial degree; and there is no Democrat of thoughtfulness that I have met who contemplates a program of free trade.

According to the President, we shall probably never see a time when that policy can be altered in any substantial degree, and he has met no thoughtful Democrat who contemplates the establishment of free trade. The discrimination against the farmer embodied in the present tariff law, therefore, must be looked upon as a continuing policy. It is not merely a temporary discrimination, resulting from a transition from one economic policy to another; it is part of a policy which is meant to continue. If we were to have free trade in all products, I believe the American farmer could worry along as well under free trade as a person engaged in any other industry, but what the farmer objects to, and what he has a right to object to, is the removal of the duties on his products while retaining them on manufactures. It is the principle of the Canadian reciprocity measure over again—free trade in the products that the farmer sells and protection on what he has to buy. The farmer is expected to sell in competition with the world and to buy in a protected market.

The failure to reduce Government expenditures and to reduce the cost of living are not the only instances in which the Democratic performance falls short of the platform promise. With regard to the antitrust laws, the platform says:

> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States. * * *
> We regret that the Sherman antitrust law has received a judicial construction depriving it of much of its efficacy, and we favor the enactment of legislation which will restore to the statute the strength of which it has been deprived by such interpretation.

Is the Clayton bill with its teeth removed, the conference report on which was agreed to the other day, a fulfillment of this promise? My distinguished Democratic friend from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] says, in regard to this measure:

> I have been told by Senators for whom I have the greatest respect, both for their legal ability and their political principles, that it was my political duty to stand by this report. This, Mr. President, I repel and deny. I deem it my duty to stand by that which I deem right, and this thought has prompted every vote I have cast in this body. I had felt that this report should be sent back to conference, that it might be shaped and molded to the interests of justice and in harmony with our party's promises.
> * * * I oppose this measure because I believe that some influence—I can not say what influence, but some influence, it seems to me uncanny, dangerous to the Republic—has changed the text and character of the bill until it does not stand for the smaller man or the middleman, but tends to advance to further supremacy the giant monopolies that you and I, in both platforms, have pledged ourselves to destroy, and for whose destruction these many years we have struggled.

No; no one who knows the Senator from New Jersey will doubt that.

The fearless Democratic Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] says:

> I had hoped that when this measure came into the Senate we would have a bill which would provide a remedy for the existing conditions, and would be something positive. * * *
> If it is true, as is conceded here, that the Sherman antitrust law supplies every remedy which this bill is supposed to afford, there is no use whatever in passing the measure. If, on the other hand, it affords a loophole and an indirect method by which those who are guilty of practicing these unfair methods upon the people can escape from being brought to justice under the Sherman law, then it is more than an innocuous measure, it is a dangerous one. It is, in that event, an evil measure and one which ought to be defeated in fairness to the people of this country.

The brilliant Democratic Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] says:

> Mr. President, this bill is entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes." I shall endeavor to show that, if it passes in its present form, the title ought to be stricken out, and it ought to be entitled "An act to apologize to unlawful restraints and monopolies."
> This measure has been loudly heralded as the Clayton antitrust bill. It should be now known as the "conferees' capitulation bill." Presumably it was brought forward as the legislative crystallization of the years-old Democratic promise that the trusts should be exterminated, root and branch. The people were led to believe that the Democratic Party, now in full possession of all branches of the Government, by this bill intended to make private monopoly, which has hitherto been characterized as "indefensible and intolerable," both unprofitable and dangerous.
> In its inception this legislation was a challenge to the field of battle. In its finality it is a sort of Hague propaganda promulgated under white flags to the soothing melodies of "Peace on earth, good will toward the trusts."
> The doctrine of extermination has given place to the policy of diplomatic negotiations to be conducted by various boards with the express understanding that, whatever the result, no law violator is to be hurt, no trust magnate is to be sent to jail, no rude sheriff or marshal is to lay his callous fingers upon the perfumed collar of a captain of industry.
> The Sherman Antitrust Act has been upon the books for 24 years. During all that time it has disturbed the dreams and troubled the waking hours of trust magnates.
> With brutal frankness and shocking candor it declares that "every person who shall make any contract, combination, in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade, or who shall monopolize interstate trade or commerce shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both." By positive command it directs the Department of Justice to enforce its drastic, harsh, and ungentle provisions.
> We are now about to prescribe a new procedure which does not contain a single criminal penalty for trusts—not one.
> Previous to the enactment of this legislation there was but one road the officers of the law could travel in pursuit of a conspirator against commercial independence.
> We have now provided another legal highway, the great length and numerous meanderings and sinuosities of which eventually lead to certain hybrid tribunals called commissions, without power even to enter a final decree. They can neither levy a fine, enforce a mandate, nor send a single culprit to jail.
> After time has for years run its weary course and the ingenuity of counsel has at last failed to furnish an excuse for misconduct or to find escape in legal technicality, the worst fate the trust can suffer is that it may be directed to stop some particular practice, in which event the trust magnate's disappointment is palliated by the consoling reflection that he retains the loot, is in no danger of the jail, and is free to devise some new and equally safe plan of plunder.
> When the Clayton bill was first written it was a raging lion with a mouth full of teeth. It has degenerated to a tabby cat with soft gums, a plaintive "meow," and an anemic appearance. It is a sort of legislative apology to the trusts, delivered hat in hand and accompanied by assurances that no discourtesy is intended.
> It is now confessed, therefore, by one of the sponsors of this bill that it is not intended to touch the trusts and monopolies. I say that the people of the United States have expected us "to touch trusts and monopolies," and I am glad to be met in the early part of this discussion with an admission that we have not laid so much as a finger upon them.
> Oh, this is a great antitrust Congress! Compared with the Congress that put upon the statute books the Sherman Act, we appear as would a lot of wet nurses in comparison with soldiers on the field of battle, arms in hand. If we had the original Sherman Act before this Congress, the "trust busters" of the present day and generation would shy like the country horse of 15 years ago did at the sight of an automobile. You would not find this Congress using such violent and offensive language as this:
> "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal."
> * * * What would this Congress do if asked to enact into law this fearful language, which follows that which I have just read?—
> "Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."
> Well, old John Sherman and the Republicans of that day did pass that law. Their "little fingers were bigger than our loins." Theirs was the spirit of the eagle; ours that of the barnyard fowl.
> * * * I make contention because I believe this bill is a betrayal of the Democratic Party and of the country. I do not care how innocent that betrayal may be. I do not care how much of good faith may have gone along with it. As I view this legislation it is an absolute turning around, a facing about by our party. We march now to the rear, where we promised the country to advance to the front.

On this side of the Chamber the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] says in his able address:

In other words, Mr. President, this is another step indicating a complete change of policy upon the part of the Government with reference to dealing with monopolies and trusts. It is a confirmation of steps which have heretofore been taken along that line, and, indeed, must be considered as in a measure a final approval of the change of policy.

The fact, Mr. President, that the Sherman law remains upon the statute books does not at all mollify my opposition to this law; neither does it, in my judgment, change the fact that we are changing our policy with reference to it, because it is not a question of the Sherman law remaining upon the statute books, but the question is, Are we preparing to abandon the enforcement of the Sherman law and to ignore that method and manner of dealing with monopolies and trusts, and are we preparing to take up another method which must be in its practical workings in contravention to the theory which is embodied in the Sherman law? Are we substituting a method of dealing with monopoly, which substituted method will strengthen the argument of those who disbelieve in the Sherman law and the principle upon which it was founded?

I think that the supporters of the bill will agree with me that it establishes two things pretty conclusively. First, that it is in support and in aid of the Trade Commission principle, to wit, the regulation of monopolies, because that is what it will result in; and, secondly, that the enforcement of the criminal law with regard to trusts is undesirable, if not ineffective. Both of these propositions are in clear contravention to the whole theory and every principle of the Sherman law.

There will be but one interpretation placed upon these acts, and justly so, when they are thoroughly understood, and that is that the Congress of the United States has in its wisdom determined that the course which has been heretofore pursued has been a failure; that the ultimate success for which we hoped can not be realized; and that, slowly, it is true, but step by step, we are changing the policy and are undertaking to regulate and control these vast monopolies and combines instead of destroying them.

Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to concede to some of those who take that view the same integrity of purpose, the same patriotism which those who are opposed to it claim for themselves. They may be right. It may be that we shall be driven to that course. It may be that that is the only successful way, or if not the only successful way the only partially successful way, in which we can deal with these questions. But, speaking for myself, I am not ready to adopt that policy. I am not willing to concede the proposition. I am so firmly convinced that in the present condition of the Sherman law as interpreted by the Supreme Court it can be successfully enforced, and I am so firmly convinced that its successful enforcement will be to the ultimate good of the people of this country, yea, more necessary for the ultimate preservation of the Republican institutions of this country, that I can not bring myself to yield in the first struggle for this new policy. I look upon the very existence of these monopolies, these vast and powerful combines, as so fraught with evil, so destructive of every theory and principle upon which a republic is built, that I must oppose to the last any policy which would tolerate them.

* * * I want to see legitimate business protected and I want to see it prosper. I want to legislate upon the theory that 98 per cent of our business men are honest and conduct their business upon and along honorable lines. I want to hold to the wise and most salutary rules wrought out by human experience that, except in most urgent and in most exceptional instances, men should be left free to work out through their own initiative and self-help their own salvation and that bureaucracy is as blighting to the energies of free men as the August frost to the husbandman's hopes. But I do not want to see, either now or hereafter, any compromise with illegitimate business or dishonest methods through and by means of which great monopolies are built up. I want the same kind of punishment administered to theft, however it may be committed. Upon these lines I want to see legislation framed.

In my judgment there is only one way in which to deal with that class, and that is to destroy their power absolutely. I think the Attorney General, as was said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], has stated the fact correctly, that the fault with the Sherman law has been its lack of enforcement. * * * There seems to be a view to the effect that that act is incomplete; that its definitions, as announced by the court, are difficult to understand; that men have difficulty in knowing what they are to do; and that it is incomplete and insufficient to accomplish the purposes for which it was passed.

That law was passed, Mr. President, in 1890, and has been upon the statute books now for over 23 years. For only about 6 or 7 years during its existence has there been any real attempt, in my judgment, to enforce it. It contains a provision for injunctive relief against the formation of these combines, a provision for the punishment of those who violate it, a provision for the forfeiture of property, and a provision for the dissolution of the combines after they are formed. It is wide-reaching, comprehensive, and now, under the decisions of the court, it covers every conceivable form of monopoly or of monopolistic practice. It is not a question of the insufficiency of the law, therefore, but it is a question of its enforcement.

I am opposed to this scheme, which has for its effect, if not for its purpose, to draw the fight away from monopoly and expend our energies and our time in overseeing those who need no overseeing and who need no surveillance. I know why it is done, and everyone who reflects upon the situation knows why it is done.

The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] says:

What does the antitrust law provide? It provides that any restraint or any monopoly is obnoxious to the law. Now, you have injected into this statute the word "substantially." We have gotten rid of the word "reasonable," according to the expression of Chief Justice White in the Tobacco case, but now you are injecting a new term into it; and that raises the question as to what "substantial" or "substantially" means. What is a "substantial" lessening of competition? That phrase has been injected into the bill ex industria in a great many points, and it tends greatly to weaken it, to lead to confusion, and to further hairsplitting arguments. There is no such qualification in the antitrust law. It does not say "substantially to restrain trade" or "substantially to create a monopoly."

* * * * * * *

I submit that if we intend to legislate so as to afford remedies to the public; if we intend, as has been proclaimed and given out from the housetops, to strengthen the antitrust law, give ampler remedies to the public, and aid that law in its enforcement, the poorest way to do it is to emasculate it and dilute it, as we have done in the case of section 2 of the conference bill.

* * * * * * *

So, Mr. President, in conclusion I want to say that while this bill was launched with a great blare of trumpets as a measure that was calculated to fortify the antitrust law, to give greater and more comprehensive remedies against trusts, and to give ampler latitude to labor organizations, yet in all of these respects it is diluted and emasculated and an utter failure as a remedial measure. As a strengthening of the antitrust law it is an abject failure; and in respect to the legislation asked for by labor organizations, it is to a large extent a failure, and fails to give them what they looked for and expected.

And the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] says in regard to the bill as agreed to in conference:

I want to say, having been a participant in this legislation, having been a watchful attendant upon these proceedings, without any hesitation and without impugning the motives of any man, that the adoption of the conference report in its present form upon the antitrust bill known as the Clayton bill is an absolute going backward upon this great question.

* * * * * * *

* * * I do believe that the invisible government has fastened upon this administration. I believe that invisible government is tightening its hold day after day, and I believe now what I did not believe when I voted for the Trade Commission bill or for this bill in the Senate, that these bills and the postponed third bill, which will be the great remedy to deal with securities, are part and parcel of a program; but I can not believe that any man possessing the ideals of the President is conscious of this surrender and this betrayal.

* * * * * * *

Now, after 18 months of legislation, we have a Trade Commission which violates a principle which was one of the cardinal features of the campaign of 1912. We have this Clayton bill, so called, the antitrust bill, with a report of the conferees that absolutely strips it of its strength, of its vigor, and of its value. * * * I, for one, hope that the Senate will be able to reject this report; that whatever this mysterious force is that to-day is closing down upon this Government, it may here meet a Waterloo; that whatever that force may be in its personal equation, it will find that it is unsafe to put forth its tentacles to smother the aspirations, the hopes, and the purposes of the American people.

The junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] says:

Mr. President, it seems to me that it can be truthfully said that we will never be able to settle the trust question until we either make it unprofitable for a trust to organize or surround trust magnates with such criminal laws as will make it dangerous for them to organize. That danger, if we resort to that method, must be so certain as to amount almost to a conviction, and when we put into the law little words that will enable them in court to offer unusual evidence, to secure delays, to resort to technicalities—when we incorporate in the law such words as the word "substantially," which has been so often used throughout this bill in different places by the conferees, we only give the trusts and trust promoters additional avenues of escape.

The kind of legislation that I have outlined would not be harmful to business; it would not injure honest men; it would do no injury to those who were obeying the law. If we want to handle the trusts and trust magnates lightly and gingerly, as this conference bill will handle them, we might just as well give them license to prey upon the people and the country without limit.

It is of interest to note in this connection that the Democratic platform did not declare for a Federal Trade Commission. And in the New Freedom I find the following in regard to a trade commission:

On page 201:

If the Government is to tell big business men how to run their business, then don't you see that big business men have to get closer to the Government even than they are now? Don't you see that they must capture the Government, in order not to be restrained too much by it? Must capture the Government? They have already captured it. Are you going to invite those inside to stay inside?

On page 202:

At the least, under the plan I am opposing, there will be an avowed partnership between the Government and the trusts. I take it that the firm will be ostensibly controlled by the senior member. For I take it that the Government of the United States is at least the senior member, though the younger member has all along been running the business. But when all the momentum, when all the energy, when a great deal of the genius, as so often happens in partnerships the world over, is with the junior partner, I don't think that the superintendence of the senior partner is going to amount to very much.

On page 206:

The Roosevelt plan is that there shall be an industrial commission charged with the supervision of the great monopolistic combinations which have been formed under the protection of the tariff, and that the Government of the United States shall see to it that these gentlemen who have conquered labor shall be kind to labor. I find, then, the proposition to be this: That there shall be two masters, the great corporation, and over it the Government of the United States; and I ask who is going to be master of the Government of the United States? It has a master now—those who in combination control these monopolies. And if the Government controlled by the monopolies in its turn controls the monopolies, the partnership is finally consummated.

On page 210:

Moreover, under the system proposed most employers—at any rate, practically all of the most powerful of them—would be, to all intents and purposes, wards and protégés of the Government, which is the master of us all, for no part of this program can be discussed intelligently without remembering that monopoly, as handled by it, is not to be prevented, but accepted. It is to be accepted and regulated. All attempt to resist it is to be given up. It is to be accepted as inevitable. The Government is to set up a commission whose duty it will be not to check or defeat it, but merely to regulate it under rules which it is itself to frame and develop. So that the chief employers will have this tremendous authority behind them; what they do they will have the license of the Federal Government to do.

There has been a history of the human race, you know, and a history of government; it is recorded; and the kind of thing proposed has been tried again and again and has always led to the same result. History is strewn all along its course with the wrecks of governments that tried to be humane, tried to carry out humane programs through the instrumentality of those who controlled the material fortunes of the rest of their fellow citizens.

I do not trust any promises of a change of temper on the part of monopoly. Monopoly never was conceived in the temper of tolerance. Monopoly never was conceived with the purpose of general development. It was conceived with the purpose of special advantage.

If you will point me to the least promise of disinterestedness on the part of the masters of our lives, then I will conceive you some ray of hope, but only upon this hypothesis, only upon this conjecture—that the history of the world is going to be reversed and that the men who have the power to oppress us will be kind to us and will promote our interests, whether our interests jump with theirs or not.

Since that time, however, the President appears to have changed his view, to have become convinced that the men controlling big business are capable of changing their temper and tactics. In his address to Congress, January 20, 1914, he says:

The great business men who organized and financed monopoly and those who administered it in actual everyday transactions have year after year until now either denied its existence or justified it as necessary for the effective maintenance and development of the vast business processes of the country in the modern circumstances of trade and manufacture and finance; * * * at last the masters of business on the great scale have begun to yield their preference and purpose, perhaps their judgment also, in honorable surrender. * * * * * * The antagonism between business and government is over. * * * The Government and business men are ready to meet each other halfway in a common effort to square business methods with both public opinion and the law.

My view is that when it is a question of "squaring business methods with both public opinion and the law," the Government should not meet those business men who have been violating the laws halfway any more than persons violating other laws are met halfway.

When serious contest ends, when men unite in opinion and purpose, those who are to change their ways of business joining with those who ask for the change, it is possible to effect it in the way in which prudent and thoughtful and patriotic men would wish to see it brought about, with as few, as slight, as easy, and simple business readjustments as possible in the circumstances, nothing essential disturbed, nothing torn up by the roots, no parts rent asunder which can be left in wholesome combination.

I do not know just how others read this, but to me it looks like an appeal to treat the trusts gently.

Fortunately no measures of sweeping or novel change are necessary. It will be understood that our object is not to unsettle business or anywhere seriously to break its established courses athwart.

* * * * * * *

The business of the country awaits, also, has long awaited, and has suffered because it could not obtain further and more explicit legislative definition of the policy and meaning of the existing antitrust law. Nothing hampers business like uncertainty. Nothing daunts or discourages it like the necessity to take chances, to run the risk of falling under the condemnation of the law before it can make sure just what the law is. Surely we are sufficiently familiar with the actual processes and methods of monopoly and of the many hurtful restraints of trade to make definition possible—at any rate, up to the limits of what experience has disclosed.

I do not believe that the persons forming the big trusts have been in doubt as to whether the antitrust law was intended to prevent what they were doing. What they may have been in doubt as to was whether adroit counsel might find a loophole somewhere in case they were prosecuted under the Sherman Act.

Quoting the President further:

And the business men of the country desire something more than that the menace of legal process in these matters be made explicit and intelligible. They desire the advice, the definite guidance, and information which can be supplied by an administrative body and interstate trade commission.

I will quote again from the speech of the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]:

Recurring now to the year 1912, it was my privilege to sit as chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce during the long hearings which were held upon the trust question. One after another, as the great trust magnates came before that committee, with this theory or that, in the last analysis nearly every one reached the point where he wanted a body of men in Washington that he could come to, sit down with, and discuss the situation. It was then, with much astonishment, that I beheld the Executive apparently viewing with favor the proposition to establish a Trade Commission. He had suggested a Trade Commission, but had carefully safeguarded in his suggestion giving that Trade Commission any authority to declare what was or what was not illegal * * *.

The Trade Commission bill, however, came in, and I for one voted for it. I voted for it with some misgiving, but I realized that we can not always have such legislation as we want, and if the Trade Commission bill was fairly and loyally administered it might prove a benefit to the country. * * *

I voted for that measure because, as I say, I felt that, perhaps, if it were wisely administered, it might be of service to the country. I am now satisfied that it was part and parcel of a policy of which I believe the President himself is ignorant, of which I believe even the conferees—I mean, of course, the Democratic conferees, who signed the report, for the Republican conferees refused to sign it—on this bill are ignorant; a policy to put this Government back into the hands of "big business."

Mr. President, whether time shall show this legislation to be wise or unwise, whether experience shall demonstrate that it is beneficent or otherwise, I can come to no other conclusion but that it is not in accordance with the Democratic platform promises as they were interpreted by the party's candidate for President.

Regarding the term of President, the Democratic platform says:

We favor a single presidential term, and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle.

Just why this plank was inserted I shall not undertake to say, but it is evident that our Democratic friends have forgotten its existence. There is no attempt being made to secure the amendment of the Constitution, as indicated, and I am inclined to believe that no attempt will be made under the present administration.

The Democratic platform further says, with reference to the Panama Canal:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

We all remember what happened to this policy, in spite of the declaration of the platform that "our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign," and in spite of their presidential candidate's declaration that their platform was not "molasses to catch flies."

The platform plank on banking and currency is as follows:

We oppose the so-called Aldrich bill or the establishment of a central bank; and we believe the people of the country will be largely freed from panics and consequent unemployment and business depression by such a systematic revision of our banking laws as will render temporary relief in localities where such relief is needed, with protection from control or dominion by what is known as the Money Trust.

Banks exist for the accommodation of the public, and not for the control of business. All legislation on the subject of banking and currency should have for its purpose the securing of these accommodations on terms of absolute security to the public and of complete protection from the misuse of the power that wealth gives to those who possess it.

We condemn the present methods of depositing Government funds in a few favored banks, largely situated in or controlled by Wall Street, in return for political favors, and we pledge our party to provide by law for their deposit by competitive bidding in the banking institutions of the country, National and State, without discrimination as to locality upon approved securities and subject to call by the Government.

There is the currency question. Are we going to settle the currency question so long as the Government listens only to the counsel of those who command the banking situation?

The currency bill which became a law, however, was not drafted so as to contain the provisions which a person reading the platform pledges and Mr. Wilson's statement might have expected. Its reputed author was at the time the editor of the New York Journal of Commerce, and with his environment it might justly have been expected that in his view the most important feature of a currency system would be the effectiveness with which the bankers and financial interests might marshal and reenforce their resources rather than the guarding of the interests of those whom the banking system is supposed to serve, and that he would be inclined to consider the prosperity of the banks rather than the welfare of their patrons.

However it has come about, it is more important still that the control of credit also has become dangerously centralized. It is the mere truth to say that the financial resources of the country are not at the command of those who do not submit to the direction and domination of small groups of capitalists who wish to keep the economic development of the country under their own eye and guidance. The great monopoly in this country is the monopoly of big credits. So long as that exists our old variety and freedom and individual energy of development are out of the question. A great industrial nation is controlled by its system of credit. Our system of credit is privately concentrated. The growth of the Nation, therefore, and all our activities are in the hands of a few men who, even if their action be honest and intended for the public interest, are necessarily concentrated upon the great undertakings in which their own money is involved and who necessarily, by very reason of their own limitations, chill and check and destroy genuine economic freedom. This is the greatest question of all, and to this statesmen must address themselves with an earnest determination to serve the long future and the true liberties of men.

This Money Trust, or, as it should be more properly called, this Credit Trust, of which Congress has begun an investigation, is no myth. It is no imaginary thing. It is not an ordinary trust like another. It doesn't do business every day. It does business only when there is occasion to do business. You can sometimes do something large when it isn't watching, but when it is watching you can't do much. And I have seen men squeezed by it. I have seen men who, as they themselves expressed it, were "put out of business by Wall Street," because Wall Street found them inconvenient and didn't want their competition.

Mr. President, I must say that I do not believe that anyone who has been intimately associated with men responsible for the conditions which are so clearly outlined in President Wilson's words, even though he may have had no part in the creation of those conditions, is the proper person either to draft a banking law for the country or to be placed on a board to carry the system into effect. So far as the remedying of these conditions by the new banking system is concerned, it does not appear to me that it will have any such result.

The new system is a bankers' system, made for the bankers and controlled by bankers. Attention may be called to the Federal Reserve Board, but I believe it will be found that when the system finally is put into operation the board will have little power to control its operations; that these will depend on the will of the Federal reserve banks and the member banks, and the latter have been bound together into an organization which enables them to control the banking industry and credits all over the country, with no competition and with responsibility to no one. The instruments of government having anything to do with the system are instituted to look after the solvency of the banks and the welfare of the banks, and there is no governmental agency to see that the power to control credit is not misused. Manufacturers, or persons engaged in any other line of business except banking, forming such a combination as has been provided for in the new banking and currency law, would be prosecuted under the Sherman Antitrust Act. It may be that the law will not directly aid the Money Trust in securing greater control over the credit of the country; it certainly will not make it any more difficult. It appears to me that it will make it easier to the extent that an organization has been legalized and perfected with nothing to prevent the Money Trust from securing control.

This law also provides for the issue of currency based on commercial paper, and the only limitation on the issuance of such currency is the supply of gold required as a reserve against it. At present the law requires a reserve of 40 per cent, in gold, against the amount of currency outstanding. How long it would be before there would be pressure for a reduction of the amount required as reserve I shall not undertake to say. The readiness with which the bills liberalizing the requirements of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act were passed this summer, and with which, on the recommendation of the Federal Reserve Board, the Senate passed the bill which authorizes the Federal Reserve Board to permit banks to keep all of their reserves in the Federal reserve banks—without retaining any in their own vaults—rather indicates to me that there would be danger that if the banks should consider this requirement as to a reserve against outstanding currency burdensome they might not have much difficulty in having it reduced. Even if this requirement should not be changed, however, it appears to me that there is danger of inflation, as attention was called to at the time of the passage of this act. And I may add, in this connection, that it appears to me that there is danger of this under the modified Aldrich-Vreeland Act, as now put into operation. Under the provisions of this act additional currency has been put into circulation, so that on October 1, 1914, there were outstanding national-bank notes to the amount of $1,050,869,169, as against $709,677,098 October 1, 1913, a gain of more than $351,000,000, or about 50 per cent. The contraction in the rest of our currency was only a small fraction of this. The money of all kinds in circulation was greater than a year ago by $292,270,626. And the end of the increase in our currency is not yet. All the bank notes under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act have been issued within the last two months. As was to be expected, the greater part of the issue went to the money centers, New York City getting almost one-half of it. Whether, as has been charged, it is being used to finance speculation and gambling in farm products I shall not undertake to say, but I believe it would have been well to have investigated the matter before deciding to ask additional taxes of $100,000,000 rather than withdraw part or all of the $75,000,000 at present on deposit in the banks.

The Secretary of the Treasury announced some time ago that $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 had been, or would be, furnished the national banks in the different States in order to move the crops. It appears that instead of this sum only $13,029,746 had been deposited for this purpose up to September 28. Five States had received a million or more, namely, Kentucky, $1,375,000; Maryland, $1,450,000; Illinois, $1,200,000; Missouri, $1,550,000; and New York, $1,000,000. These are hardly the States in which we have been accustomed to believe there was need of money for moving the crops. Kansas, which, if the estimates of the Agricultural Department are correct, this year produced a greater wheat crop than any State has every previously produced, has received $25,000 to help move its immense crop. Twenty-five States, including North Dakota and South Dakota, have received none of this money. I do not say that the States which have not received any of this money have been discriminated against, since the banks in these States may not have considered that they needed any of these funds and consequently may not have asked for any, but it is evident that whatever the money is used for not a very large part of it is used to move the crops.

With regard to rural credits, the platform said——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in regard to the last point upon which my friend the Senator from North Dakota has been dwelling, as he said only thirteen million and something had been deposited out of the amount which had been promised, I wish to say I am informed that the amount promised will be deposited; but it was thought to be more wise to deposit it in installments as it was needed, that it would be less calculated to breed speculation and overstimulate for the time being, tending to reflex action later on.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have no doubt as to the honest purposes of the Government officials in doing what they believe is right, but, as a financier on a small scale, I claim that they are making a great mistake. I am only pointing out facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not undertaking to answer what the Senator is saying, nor to question it. I merely wanted to explain that particular objection which he has made. It is not a violation of faith, because the full amount will be deposited, and they think it wiser to deposit it little by little than to do it all at once.

Mr. GRONNA. On that point I do not disagree with my distinguished friend from Mississippi at all. But, Mr. President, now we come to a plank in the Democratic platform as to which the Senator from Mississippi and I probably would disagree. I shall read what the platform has said in reference to rural credits. If I may digress for a moment, I will say that if we had a rural credit system in vogue at the present time there would be no need of asking for any further legislation to help out the cotton situation in the Southern States. I am sure the Senator from Mississippi has given that great question study the same as he has most other great questions. I may be a crank upon the subject, but it seems to me that no law could be passed that would be of any greater or more substantial benefit to all the people than a thorough rural credit system, giving the producer at least an opportunity to say how our finances should be regulated and controlled and not placing the matter all in the hands of a few large banks.

With regard to rural credits, the Democratic platform said:

> Of equal importance with the question of currency reform is the question of rural credits or agricultural finance.

That is absolutely true; it is of equal importance. The Democrats were right when they said in their platform at Baltimore that it is "of equal importance," but what I am calling attention to is that you have failed to carry it out.

While the currency bill, however, became a law more than nine months ago, no rural credit bill has as yet been reported from the banking committee of either House. If the question of rural credits is of equal importance with the currency question, why this continued delay in taking it up for consideration? It certainly is not a more difficult question than the other. While we may differ as to what would be the best measure to pass, the diversity of opinion is not so great as it was on the currency question. If the same force which secured action on the currency question would exert itself in behalf of a rural credits bill, we should have legislation on the subject in short order. That is my belief. The present outlook, however, I regret to say, is not only that no legislation of this kind will be had this session, but that it is doubtful whether anything will be done during the next session.

And I wish to say that legislation of this kind is just as much needed now as when the platform was written. Although it has been widely heralded that the new banking law would give the farmers cheaper loans on account of the provision permitting national banks to lend a certain amount on farm lands, it has had no such effect. A large number of banks will not make such loans. As a matter of fact—and I weigh my words when I say as a matter of fact—I know that in my section rates on farm loans have actually increased during the last year.

With regard to the merchant marine, the platform said:

> We believe in fostering by constitutional regulation of commerce the growth of a merchant marine which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the South, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

My friend from Mississippi and I do not disagree on that. I have followed his leadership in the House many a time when he fought those battles on the other side in that body, and I believe I should be glad to follow him again.

The proposal now is to pass a bill providing for the purchase of merchant vessels by the Government for the benefit of our foreign trade. Without discussing its necessity or desirability I must say that it does not appear to me that this is in accordance with the platform declaration, because the platform said it should be done without any burden on the Treasury. The bill which it is reported the President will insist on being passed when Congress reassembles will carry an appropriation of $30,000,000, which can be obtained only by imposing "additional burdens upon the people."

I do not take issue with the policy; I simply comment, and I think I have the right, I think it is my duty, to comment on the fact that you have failed to carry out the definite promises you made in those solemn declarations.

The civil-service plank is as follows:

> The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rightly enforced, to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than service rendered to a political party; and we favor a reorganization of the civil service, with adequate compensation commensurate with the class of work performed for all officers and employees; we also recommend the extension to all classes of civil-service employees of the benefits of the provisions of the employer's liability law, and we also recognize the right of direct petition to Congress by employees for the redress of grievance.

If the practice of passing laws taking various Government employees out of the classified civil service is continued, I presume that after a while even the most strenuous spoilsman will not object to the "honest and rigid enforcement" of the civil-service laws. The Democratic platform further says:

> We favor such legislation as will effectually prohibit the railroads, express, telegraph, and telephone companies from engaging in business which brings them into competition with their shippers or patrons, also legislation preventing the overissue of stocks and bonds by interstate railroads, express companies, telegraph and telephone lines, and legislation which will assure reductions in transportation rates as conditions will permit, care being taken to avoid reduction that would compel a reduction of wages, prevent adequate service, or do injustice to legitimate investments.

I take it that a large majority of the people of the United States would favor that provision; at least, I favor it. By most people the latter part of this plank would undoubtedly be taken to mean that there would be substantial reductions in transportation rates, and presumably it was intended to be so understood. As a matter of fact, there has been no reduction in transportation rates; on the contrary, there have been some advances, and indications rather point to additional advances in place of reductions.

No bill preventing the overissue of stocks and bonds by common carriers engaged in interstate business has as yet come before the Senate, and it is now reported that it will not only not be taken up at this session but that it is not likely to be passed at the next session, and may be postponed indefinitely. Of course that is only conjecture on my part.

The platform also says:

> We favor the establishment of a parcel post or postal express, and also the extension of the rural delivery system as rapidly as practicable.

The law providing for a parcel post was passed and the system was established during the administration of President Taft. In spite of the declaration in the platform for the rapid extension of the Rural Delivery Service, the Post Office Department is at present delaying the extension of the service and is holding up cases in which all the requirements of law and of the department have been met in order that the department may point to a record for economy at the end of the year. I do not believe that is the way to economize. The people pay for the Postal Service and have a right to demand that satisfactory service be given them. The action of the Post Office Department would be unwarranted under any circumstances, and it is squarely in opposition to the platform declaration.

The Democratic platform concludes as follows:

> Our platform is one of principles which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign, and we invite the cooperation of all citizens, regardless of party, who believe in maintaining unimpaired the institutions and traditions of our country.

The Democratic Party may have attempted to keep those pledges which, after getting into power, they decided should be kept. They have not attempted to keep all of them, and they have failed to keep most of them.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I desire to refer to two or three matters which have been discussed since this bill was taken up, not, however, going into details which have already been thoroughly covered by those who oppose the bill, both in the House and in the Senate, for I have no disposition to encumber the RECORD with matter which has already been printed or to take the time of the Senate to go over subjects which have been thoroughly discussed.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. SIMMONS], in presenting the bill, suggested that the Republicans were opposing it for political rather than for financial reasons, stating that it was necessary to pass legislation of this character or of some character which would produce additional revenue, and that in his opinion no Republican really wished to have the legislation fail, but was opposing it hoping to obtain some political advantage from so doing. There may be some basis of fact in that statement, and yet, Mr. President, I assume that no Republican would wish to have the Government insufficiently financed. I am one of those Republicans who believe that foreign conditions are such that the Government should not only be financed as it would be in ordinary times, but that it should even be stronger than in ordinary times, so that it might, if necessary, come to the relief of necessary matters which are within the provisions of law. The Treasury, in my judgment, Mr. President, is not now in good condition; in fact, relatively speaking, I think it is in weaker condition than ordinary demands justify.

The suggestion has been made by some of those discussing the bill that if the Government would withdraw from the national banks the moneys which are deposited in them it would carry the administration along for a few months at least, and that such moneys should be used before additional taxes are laid. There is some basis of truth in that statement, and yet if the Government withdrew from the national banks the money now on deposit in them and paid it out without having additional revenues to offset such expenditures the Treasury would be in a deplorable condition.

I find on examination of the daily statement of the United States Treasury for August 1 that the net balance in the general fund was $142,741,000. That means that, including all gold, silver, and other moneys in the Treasury, all deposits in national banks, and all credits of postmasters and other officers on the asset side of the account, and assuming that all indebtedness which was current has been paid, there would be a balance left of the amount which I have stated.

On the 2d day of September, one month later, I find that the net balance in the general fund had decreased from $142,741,000 to $122,843,000, or about $20,000,000 in one month. That means, of course, that the expenditures for that month exceeded the receipts by about $20,000,000.

On the 8th day of October the daily statement shows that the net balance in the general fund was $103,496,000, or about $19,000,000 less than it was on the 2d day of September. Therefore since the outbreak of the European war the Government's expenditures have exceeded the Government's receipts by substantially $18,000,000 a month.

It stands to reason that that condition can not continue for an indefinite time, so Congress must at some time make provision to take care of the appropriations which have been made. Up to that point I am quite in agreement with my Democratic friends, fearful though they are, I know, of the political effect which will result from the passage of a revenue bill of any kind at this time.

But what I object to, Mr. President, in their program is the reasons which are assigned for its necessity and the manner of raising the revenue. The latter objection is perhaps fundamental as between the Democratic Party and my own views of what should be done in such a contingency. The first is based on a juggling with figures, in my judgment.

I make this general statement: If the Payne-Aldrich Act had remained in operation during the past year to the 1st day of October, 1914, and the importations had been as large as they have been during the past year, we would have had ample revenue for all purposes, including the extravagances of the present Congress and the last Congress, and would have had as much surplus as we had when the Democratic Party took control of the Government March 4, 1913.

It may be said that the reduction of duties has increased the volume of importations. Quite likely it has had that effect, because I find on consulting the records that in the case of some articles, especially those which have been put on the free list, largely food products, the percentage of importations has increased enormously, and in every such case there has been a reduction in revenue.

I wish to call attention to a few of these items.

The value of the cattle imported into the United States for the 11 months ending August 31, 1913, was $7,050,000. In the present year, during the same months, the importations amounted to $19,018,000. Corn last year, for the same time, $162,000; this year, $9,937,000. Oats last year, $38,000; this year, $8,022,000. Hides and skins last year, $100,278,000; this year, $113,802,000. Sisal grass last year, $15,885,000; this year, $25,322,000. Showing an increase in some cases of many hundreds per cent, and in very nearly every case of important agricultural products and many manufactured articles the increase has varied from 10 to 100 per cent.

I will put this table in the RECORD, with the permission of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, to return for one moment to the question of national banks:

The Government had deposits in the national banks on the 1st day of August of this year amounting to $54,739,000. On the 2d day of September there were deposits of $68,231,000, which had been reduced on the 8th of October to $64,372,000. At no time, as far as these statements show, has the amount been as large as has been frequently stated in debate. One of the positions which our Democratic friends have taken in the past has been to criticize the operations of the Treasury under Republican administrations as to the manner in which moneys have been deposited in national banks, charging that favorite banks have been selected for these deposits. The truth of the matter is that, as far as possible, I think, such deposits were distributed throughout the country; but it was economically sound always to deposit moneys with reserve centers, because the reserve centers were the natural localities to which banks in the country would turn for assistance if they needed money.

The Senator from North Dakota has stated that there are 25 States which have not received any money during this year when money has been deposited for crop-moving purposes. I presume his statement is correct. I think he will find on investigation that in many cases banks were offered money and refused to take it under the terms made by the department. They preferred to rediscount with their reserve agents rather than to go through the operations necessary to obtain money from the Treasury, which frequently made it necessary to purchase securities which the Treasury, under its rules, would take as security for deposits.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me just on that point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. That statement is not entirely accurate, certainly not as to the Northwest, because when we came to move the crop this year the important banks of St. Paul and Minneapolis were very desirous of getting some of the Government deposits. I called personally to see about assisting in securing some of those deposits for the movement of the northwestern crops, and was informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that practically all of the money he could possibly spare was South at that time. Although the request came very urgently from that section of the country, we were unable to secure any of the Government deposits for the movement of those crops.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say also in that connection, with the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts, that a very urgent demand came from Kansas for money to aid in moving the great wheat crop, especially from Wichita, which is a thriving city in the wheat belt. I made an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he told me that the money had been assigned, and that there was none for Kansas other than the small amount referred to by the Senator from North Dakota in his speech. In order to obtain the money which conditions demanded, the banks were told that they would have to make their application under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act; and after some circuitous efforts, and with a good deal of embarrassment because of the annoyance of the operations of the system, they finally got some money after the emergency was over.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I said a moment ago that I did not know whether or not the banks had made any application. My colleague has stated that he knows application was made. I do know, however, that the rates of interest are much higher this year. That is, the rates of interest the grain men—the so-called elevator men—must pay are much higher than they were last year, or years before. Ordinarily they can get money for from 4½ to 5 per cent. This year they are paying 8 per cent. I am so told by men engaged in that business.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts permit an interruption at this point?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to corroborate what the senior Senator from North Dakota has said. I joined him in making application, on behalf of the bankers of the Twin Cities, for money to move the crops. We failed to get a single dollar, however, and were simply told that the money had already been distributed, mainly in the South, and that our people must help themselves by means of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act; and that is what they have done. I was informed to-day by one of the prominent bankers from the Twin Cities that they have taken out between twenty and thirty millions of emergency currency under that law. It does not seem that the money that has been distributed in the banks of the South has been of any practical utility to the rank and file of the people.

I am not finding fault because the Secretary of the Treasury has deposited the money there. I think they need it more; and perhaps we of the Northwest, especially in Minnesota, are in a more fortunate condition this year than any other State in the Union, and are able to take care of ourselves with the currency that we get under the Aldrich-Vreeland bill. The money that has been deposited in the South may have afforded some benefit to the banks in certain localities; but for the public at large, the farmers and the merchants, it has not proved of any value at all, and they are here crying for relief of an entirely different character.

Mr. WEEKS. My statement was based, not on official figures, but on conversations I have had with Senators from different sections of the country.

I have no doubt the experiences of the Senators who have just testified may be relatively true as applied to certain sections of the country. Unfortunately, the Treasury Department does not furnish any statement of deposits in national banks, so it is impossible to know where Government moneys are deposited. It simply prints a list of national banks which are or which may have been at some time Government depositories, without any regard as to how much money is in them, or whether there is any money deposited in them at the time the list is printed.

Incidentally, in glancing over this list to-day I was somewhat surprised to find that the two largest banks in New York—the National City Bank and the National Bank of Commerce—are not Government depositories, and therefore, of course, have no Government money; and, incidentally, I noticed that the name "Riggs National Bank of Washington" had red ink drawn through it, to indicate that it had ceased to be a Government depository. This fact will furnish evidence later on to prove that there has not been absolute impartiality on the part of the Treasury Department in its dealings with national banks under the present administration.

But, Mr. President, if all these deposits were withdrawn from the banks the Treasury Department would still not be suitably provided for this emergency, and therefore additional revenue should be raised. That being the case, what kind of a tax shall we lay? Shall we lay the kind of tax in which the Republican Party believes, to which it is committed—the tax which raises revenue and at the same time builds up our industries, and which, as far as possible, distributes its effects throughout the country—or shall we impose a tax on selected industries without having any testimony from those engaged in them as to the effect which the tax will have? Is it wise or fair to raise revenue in such a haphazard and illogical way?

It is not necessary to defend the war tax of 1898 in that respect. There was an emergency at that time, and it was necessary to raise money immediately, and therefore to lay a tax which could be applied at once and which would bring in revenue without delay. That condition, however, does not exist today. If the President had said to Congress, "Investigate this matter during the fall months," when Congress should be in adjournment, "and bring in a bill on the 1st of December," it would have been in ample time to have furnished the necessary revenue, and would have given those who were going to be taxed a chance to show what effect it would have on the industry in which they were engaged.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] suggested yesterday, during a colloquy with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] relating to the tax on beer, that it was a consumption tax, and that all the taxes proposed in this bill were, in fact, consumption taxes; and, as the Democratic Party is now putting a law on the statute books providing for such taxes, I shall assume that now it is in favor of a consumption tax. That has not always been the position taken by that party. It was not the position taken in 1898, when the positions of the two parties were reversed and the Republican Party was responsible for raising immediate revenue. The present chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, who has always been a conservative Democrat and a man of sound judgment, but with some political principles of which I do not approve, stated during the debate on that bill:

> Taxes levied on consumption, such as tariff and internal-revenue taxes, do not justly or equitably distribute the burdens of government. The man who has wealth may pay more taxes than the man who has not, because he may wear a few more clothes or smoke better cigars; but, in proportion to his wealth, you can readily see he does not begin to pay his fair proportion of taxes.
> Now, one of the great objections to the measure now before the House that I have is that it does not attempt to equalize these burdens of taxation. The chief aim and object the Republican Party seems to have, as shown by the action of those it has intrusted with power, is to exempt wealth from taxation and make the toiling masses of the people bear the burdens of government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. From whom is the Senator quoting?

Mr. WEEKS. I am quoting now from the present chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. UNDERWOOD?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. UNDERWOOD.

> What is the bill they have brought before the House? * * * It again lays additional taxes on consumption.

Which the Senator from North Carolina says is what this bill does.

> It doubles the taxes on beer.

Which the Senator from North Carolina approves.

> In the end the customer must pay for it by getting a less amount for his money. It increases the taxes on tobacco, and already in advance of the passage of the act the merchants have put up the price on their goods. They have invented innumerable stamp taxes that must annoy and harass the people.

I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to this statement:

> This tax will fall almost entirely on the hard-working and industrious artisans, merchants, mechanics, farmers, and professional men of the country, but not on idle wealth that is protected but never made to pay for the benefits received.

That was the view of the present chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in 1898. I do not know whether he has changed his views or not; but what he charged and denounced at that time is exactly what this bill does, and if it were wrong then it is wrong now. It was necessary then, because we were engaged in war without any idea when and how it would end. But it is not necessary now, because we do not need the revenue to carry on the Government, as we did in 1898.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Nor for the same reason.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, to raise the revenue necessary to carry on the Government during the immediate future, if I were responsible for it, I would restore the duties on those articles from which the duties were removed by the Underwood-Simmons Act, the result of which has not been of any benefit to any American citizen. I refer to the duty on sugar, which will cost this Government $25,000,000 in revenue in the year beginning at the date when the provision as to sugar commenced to apply; the duty on wool, which in the first seven months of its operation has cost in revenue $19,000,000, without reducing the price of wool or the products of wool in any respect; and the duty on many other articles, the price of which has not been reduced by the removal of the duty, a result which never happens, the foreigner always marking up his price to conform to the price of the market where he is selling. I would restore those duties, protecting our industries and our people and at the same time obtaining ample revenue to take care of this emergency.

The President stated in his message to Congress, which is really a message to the people of the United States—because his messages are always brief, they are always to the point, but they are not always accurate—that the loss in revenue in August was largely or almost entirely due to the falling off of importations, due to the war in Europe. It is that particular point which I wish to discuss in some detail, because the President is in a position to obtain accurate information from the departments of the Government; and when he comes to Congress and makes a definite statement of that kind, which can not be answered to the people of the country, because there is never a full opportunity to do so—no one else has the audience given the President—the people are apt to come to a wrong conclusion, as they will in this case, unless it is dinned into the ears of everyone with whom those who see the facts differently take the opportunity to discuss the matter in public. I think it can be conclusively demonstrated that there is little merit in the President's reason for the reduction in revenue, and, on the other hand, that it is almost entirely due to the reduction in duties as imposed in the Underwood-Simmons bill.

The free importations for the month of August in 1913 were $70,062, and in the month of August, 1914, they were $80,268,000.

The dutiable importations in August, 1913, were $67,588,000. In the month of August, 1914, they were $49,499,000. The total in August, 1913, was $137,651,000, and in August, 1914, $129,767,000, or a loss of $8,000,000.

As a bald statement the President would ask us to believe that a falling off in importations of $8,000,000 would produce a reduction in revenue of ten and a half million dollars—really eleven and a half million dollars. Of course that could not be possible, because there are no duties on any article that approach 100 per cent. The average rate of duty on all dutiable articles imported, even under the Payne-Aldrich law, was less than 50 per cent last year. In fact, the average ad valorem on dutiable imports in August, 1913, was 45.77 per cent. The ad valorem rate in August, 1914, was 39.26 per cent. The average ad valorem on all imports in August, 1913, was 22.47 per cent, and in August, 1914, it was 14.97 per cent.

In August, 1913, the percentage coming in free was 50.8 per cent. In August, 1914, it was 61.9 per cent.

If duties at the same rate on this year's importations had been levied that were borne by the importations which came in last year, the duties collected would have been $29,158,834, instead of $19,431,363, or $9,727,000 more than was collected under the rates imposed by the Underwood bill.

In other words, if there had been no reduction in the rate of duty carried by the Underwood bill, all the loss of revenue in the month of August would have been made up, assuming that importations were the same, except $1,776,000.

But in order to demonstrate the reason why this revenue fell off in the month of August, I am going to in detail give figures relating to different articles imported to show what the change in the rate of duty actually means in each specific case.

I will not take the time of the Senate to give all these figures, because it means going through the whole tariff bill, but I will ask permission to put into the RECORD as many of them as I think necessary in order to prove my contention, illustrating by referring to a few of them at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

[1] Deducting same amount free as 1913.
[3] Had old duty remained, increase on 1914 importations would be $2,259,350.10.

Mr. WEEKS. In 1913 the duty on cattle, substantially all kinds of cattle, was 25 per cent, and the importations were in value $714,000. The revenue obtained was therefore $178,704.

Cattle in the Underwood bill were put on the free list, and therefore if the importations in August for this year had been exactly what they were in August last year the loss of revenue in that one item would have been $178,000.

But the importations of cattle in 1914 increased from 714,000 to 1,784,000, or about 150 per cent. They came in free, so that there was no revenue from those importations; but if the same rate of duty had been maintained and the importations had been what they were this year there would have been obtained a revenue of $446,000 from that one item. Therefore there is not only a loss to the Treasury of that amount which might have been collected, but a loss to the farmers who are producing cattle as a result of the competition coming from the importation of these cattle, and there has been no resulting benefit, as far as anybody can see, to any consumer or any other American.

The rate of duty on sheep in the Payne-Aldrich bill was 17 per cent. The importations were negligible. The duty actually received was $886 in August last year. Therefore there is a loss in the case of sheep of $886 revenue by putting them on the free list. But putting them on the free list increased the importations from 5,212 to 63,779, so that if the same rate of duty had remained as obtained in the Payne-Aldrich bill, the loss of revenue from the importations of sheep this year would be $10,842. If the same number of sheep were not imported, with the duty as it was remaining last year, it would be so much better for our farmers.

All other animals under a separate heading in the tariff schedules carried a duty of 27.55 per cent. A few blooded animals came in free. All other animals were put on the free list in the Underwood bill. The duty collected last year was $218,922. Therefore that is a loss to the Treasury this year. Assume that the same number of animals came in—as a matter of fact the number increased 200 per cent in importations, so that instead of 794,000 dutiable animals coming in, as in the last year, 2,253,000 came in this year—the duty at the old rate would have amounted to $554,575. Therefore, assuming that the reduction in duty had no effect on the importations, there is a loss to the Treasury in revenues this year of $554,000.

Take the case of breadstuffs—corn, if you please. All these figures apply to the month of August. There was substantially no corn imported under the old law. This year, in the month of August, 1,248,000 bushels were brought in. The old rate of duty was 15 cents a bushel. The present rate is free. Therefore there are a million and a quarter bushels of corn which have come into this country and which have not produced any revenue, but which, if the rate of 15 cents a bushel had remained as in the Payne law, would have produced a revenue of $307,000. As a result we have, on the one hand, our farmers having to meet the competition of a million and a quarter bushels of corn imported, and, on the other hand, the Government losing the revenue which would have been obtained if the old rate of duty had been continued.

Take the case of oats. The importations of oats were negligible under the old law; 15 cents a bushel was the duty. This year the value of oats brought in has so increased that even at the reduced rate of duty from 15 cents a bushel to 6 cents a bushel there is shown a loss in revenue based on the old rate of $8,245.26.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. For what month?

Mr. WEEKS. These figures apply to August of this year and August of last year, and by them I hope to demonstrate that the loss of $9,727,000 revenue is due to the reduction of duties imposed by the Underwood-Simmons bill.

I am not going to take the time to read any more of these figures, Mr. President, because I have permission to insert them in the RECORD, but it will be found on examination that in almost all items the result is similar to those instances which I have given. I will, however, submit the last one I have before me—leather and tanned skins. The average rate of duty under the old law was 11.59 per cent. The value of the skins imported amounted to $656,000. The duty was removed by the Underwood bill, and as a result $904,000 came in in August this year, or an increase of 50 per cent. The revenue last year amounted to $70,429. That, in any case, is a loss to the Treasury. If the old rate of duty obtained and was applied to the importations of this year the revenues this year would have been $104,786.

There are more important and larger items in this list of importations which I have here, such as wool and sugar and other great staples, which are of importance to everyone in all sections of the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not wish to engage in any controversy, but I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator. Suppose one-half of all the dutiable imports from Europe should fall off as a result of the war, does not the Senator think that as a result of that falling off the Government would get less revenue under the Payne-Aldrich bill than under the present tariff? That is, suppose the one-half amounted to $250,000,000 in dutiable imports from Europe, would not the rates of the Payne-Aldrich bill, if applied to that loss in dutiable imports, raise more revenue, and, therefore, if the imports do not come in, would we not lose more revenue than if the Underwood rates were applied?

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator from North Carolina is usually perfectly clear in the statements he makes, but I think the question which he has asked is somewhat involved, if I understand it——

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, if the Senator will permit me, I will try to relieve it of that embarrassment.

I am now speaking only with reference to receipts which the Government would lose as the result of a falling off of $250,000,000 of imports which, I will say, come from Europe, or anywhere else, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. WEEKS. There is not any question about the volume of imports from Europe falling off during the continuance of the war. There will be a great falling off in the cases of those countries whose ports are blockaded—Belgium and Germany and Austria will be the principal sufferers, or are the principal sufferers at present. But if we do not get any imports from those countries during the continuance of the war, and assume the average rate of duty which all importations for the month of August, which is substantially 15 per cent, would apply to this loss, it would mean only about $3,000,000 a month, or something like $36,000,000 for the entire year. That would be the loss, assuming that we did not import a dollar's worth of goods from any one of those three countries.

Now, in the countries where the ports are open I assume that very largely our trade is going on as it has in the past, not quite to the same extent, possibly, and yet the exports which we are now making under these conditions are greater than they ever have been. I notice——

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not want to discuss that. I think the Senator has not yet quite caught the point of my question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator will allow me to ask the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to say, if I caught the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina correctly, he meant that the average rate of duty under the Simmons law being less than the average rate of duty under the Payne law, the importations would be greater under the Simmons law than under the Payne law.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I was not discussing that question at all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is what the Senator argued when the Simmons bill was passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not discussing that question at all. The Senator entirely misunderstood me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That was the argument made by the Senator when the bill was passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not talking about the argument made at some other time. I am simply talking on the question now before us. It does not involve the suggestion of the Senator at all.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator, of course, understands that the Payne rates were higher than the present bill.

Now, let us assume that this year there was a falling off in imports from Europe of $250,000,000. I do not know the exact value, but the imports from Europe amounted to $510,000,000 worth of dutiable goods, I think.

Mr. WEEKS. The total for the 12 months ending June 30 was $1,486,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. About $500,000,000 worth of dutiable goods.

Mr. WEEKS. The dutiable goods under the present act are 38 per cent of the total importations.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that is about right. Suppose we import from Europe $250,000,000 worth of dutiable merchandise, would we not lose more money in revenue if the Payne rates were in force than if the Underwood rates were in force? Would we not lose more money?

Mr. WEEKS. If we assumed that we are going to import $250,000,000 anyway, of course we would lose more under the present tariff than we would under the tariff which preceded it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Suppose you applied the Payne-Aldrich rate to the $250,000,000, the amount would be greater, would it not?

Mr. WEEKS. The amount collected?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; if we applied the Payne-Aldrich rate of duty to the $250,000,000 that does not come in, it would bring more money to the Treasury than if we applied to that $250,000,000 the rates of the present law.

Mr. WEEKS. About 50 per cent more.

Mr. SIMMONS. Therefore, if those importations are cut off, the Treasury would lose more money as a result of that cutting off under the Payne law than it would under the Underwood law.

Mr. WEEKS. But there is not any assurance that they are going to be cut off, and whatever amount does come in the loss will be greater under the present law than under the Payne-Aldrich law.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was simply assuming it. I was simply asking the Senator to look at both sides upon that assumption.

Mr. SMOOT. That argument is that if both the poor fellow who has $500 and the man who has $1,000 are ruined, the fellow who has a thousand dollars is ruined the most. That is all there is to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. All there is in it is this: That with the Payne-Aldrich bill in force if we lose $250,000,000 on our imports from Europe, the Treasury would lose more money than it would lose with the Underwood bill if there are like importations.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I assume that under the conditions which are going to exist the importations are going to be those that are absolutely necessary. If the rates of duty on the $250,000,000 suggested are those imposed by the Underwood-Simmons bill they would produce a revenue of about $37,000,000, and if they carried the rate of the Payne-Aldrich bill they would produce a revenue 50 per cent greater, or something like $55,000,000. I think the importations would be substantially the same under present conditions whatever the rate of duty imposed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was impressed when the Senator from Massachusetts was detailing the increased volume of importations with the thought that under the present tariff law, which opens the doors so wide, we have really placed aliens and foreigners who do not come within our borders at all upon practically the same footing as our own citizens. We have torn down the barriers, and a Canadian can live in any Province of Canada and enjoy all the rights that are enjoyed by American citizens of trade in our busy marts of industry and commerce, and he has the added right of being able to avoid the deficiency tax bill which is now being laid upon American citizens, because he lives beyond its reach.

I can not help being impressed with the idea that instead of cheapening products to the consumer, instead of relieving our own people from burdens, the legislation for which Senators on the other side of the Chamber are responsible, and notably the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, who occupies his place on that side of the Chamber, they have minimized the importance and dignity of American citizenshp. From every quarter of the globe the rights of our citizens to their own market has been impinged upon by the courtesy of Democratic free trade, and it has made it easy to bring the products of other men's genius in here in competition with our own.

Instead of the Senator from North Carolina getting his eye on the spigot in the barrel, he ought to take cognizance of the entire barrel and not attempt to differentiate between the revenues we would have derived under the Payne law and the revenues that we are not now deriving under the Simmons law; but he ought to consider the strength and the encouragement which would come to American business men and investors and industrial enterprises if the law which treated the American market place as the right of the American citizen had been maintained instead of passing it over to strangers who contribute nothing toward our welfare and nothing toward the genius of our institutions.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, recurring once more to the statement of imports and exports, one of the most illuminating phases of it is that it demonstrates the fact that the Underwood-Simmons bill has worked directly against the producer in this country, in addition to being a poor revenue raiser. I will give here the figures which I think demonstrate the correctness of that statement:

Crude materials for use in manufacture, of which we should import as many as possible so as to give our workmen employment, increased in amount about $34,000,000 for eight months ending August 31, 1914, over the same time in 1913.

Foodstuffs in crude condition and food animals increased about $36,000,000.

Foodstuffs partly or wholly manufactured increased about $47,000,000.

Both of those items work directly against the producers of food products in this country.

Manufactures for further use in manufacturing—that is, those that are partially manufactured, to go into finer products—decreased in amount about $34,000,000.

Manufactures ready for consumption increased in amount about $29,000,000.

Now, take the export side of that statement. We should manufacture in this country all the crude material possible and ship abroad the finished product. That would keep our workmen and our capital invested in manufacturing employed. Yet the exportation of these materials that should have been manufactured in this country fell off but $3,000,000, while manufactured products decreased in the same time $107,000,000, which would seem to be conclusive that the result of the working of the Underwood-Simmons bill has been directly against the interest of capital invested in production in this country and directly against the interests of the workmen employed in producing in this country, and, vice versa, favorable to capital and labor employed in foreign countries.

Mr. President, I am not going to take any more time now, except to suggest that the Democratic Party should have done what the whole tenor of their platform of 1912 promised to do—that is, to reduce the burdens of the people. If the Democratic Party got any support outside of those who are hidebound party members, it came on the theory that when the Democratic Party obtained power it would reduce the burdens of the people. I am perfectly willing to pause at any time when I have the floor to let any Democratic Senator state in definite mathematical terms in what way the Underwood tariff bill has reduced those burdens or in what way any legislation which has been passed since they took control of the Government March 4, 1913, has in any way reduced the people's burdens.

Not only have you been exceedingly extravagant in your appropriations, but only the half is told when the cold figures of the increased appropriations are published. Among other expenditures, you have provided for the building of a railroad in Alaska, to cost $35,000,000. The House has passed a bill providing for the construction of good roads, which carries $25,000,000. I submit that that bill as it came to the Senate would institute a system of "pork-barrel" legislation which would make anything that has been assumed to be legislation of that character look literally like nothing. It is so unscientific in its provisions that it ought not to be given a minute's consideration.

Then the President, since the European war came on, has recommended an appropriation of $30,000,000 to buy ships for the Government to go into the carrying trade; since the war came on the Department of State has been urging the appropriation of $25,000,000 to be paid to the United States of Colombia; within the same time we have had a recommendation from the State Department of an appropriation of $3,000,000 for a similar purpose in the case of Nicaragua; and since the war came on we have passed the Trade Commission bill, which will require at least $10,000,000 a year, if any considerable part of the duties of the Trade Commission are carried out. That makes a total of $128,000,000 to which the Democratic Party is committed, in addition to the appropriations that have actually been made. So if we are to provide for their excessive appropriations, and if these appropriations which have been recommended by the President are to be made, it will not only require $100,000,000 additional revenue, but in the near future it will require $200,000,000. For that condition, I submit, the Democratic Party is entirely responsible.

In a word, Mr. President, I think the Government should have more revenue, but I think the way to get that additional revenue is to reimpose the former duties on sugar and wool and the other articles from which the duty has been removed without bringing any benefit to the American consumer.

I think when the President came to Congress he should have recommended as much economy as could be practiced and at the same time carry on the necessary functions of the Government. If he had done that, the subservient Congress which sits here in the Capitol would have carried out his recommendations, just as they are carrying out the preparation of this bill, which none of you want to pass at this time, but which you are going to pass because the President has recommended it.

Therefore, if we are not going to follow in the immediate future an economical policy in the conduct of this Government, the President must be directly responsible for the result; yet, if I believed the legislation providing for the levying of taxes which we are about to pass would produce sufficient revenue and at the same time be beneficial to the interests of the business men and the workingmen of this country, and were not the illogical, haphazard tax unfair, which it is going to be when you have completed the bill, I would support it, because I believe the Government is going to need more revenue than can be obtained from the sources now available under present conditions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Finance will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 1, page 1, line 4, after the words "tax of," to strike out "$1.50" and insert "$1.75," and on page 2, line 1, after the word "accordingly," to insert "Provided, That a discount of 5 per cent shall be allowed upon all sales by collectors to brewers of the stamps provided for the payment of said tax," so as to make the section read:

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in lieu of the tax of $1 now imposed by law, a tax of $1.75 on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquor, brewed or manufactured and sold, or stored in warehouse, or removed for consumption or sale, within the United States, by whatever name such liquors may be called, for every barrel containing not more than 31 gallons; and at a like rate for any other quantity or for the fractional parts of a barrel authorized and defined by law. And section 3339 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended accordingly: Provided, That a discount of 5 per cent shall be allowed upon all sales by collectors to brewers of the stamps provided for the payment of said tax: Provided further, That the additional tax imposed in this section on all fermented liquors stored in warehouse to which a stamp has been affixed shall be assessed and collected in the manner now provided by law for the collection of taxes not paid by stamp: Provided further, That until appropriate stamps are prepared and furnished, the stamps heretofore used to denote the payment of the internal-revenue tax on fermented liquor may be stamped or imprinted with a suitable device to denote the new rate of tax herein imposed, and shall be affixed to all packages containing such liquors on which the tax imposed by this act is paid. Any person having possession of unaffixed stamps heretofore issued for the payment of the tax on fermented liquors shall present the same to the collector of the district, who shall receive them at the price paid for such stamps by the purchaser and issue in lieu thereof new or imprinted stamps at the rate provided in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, there are very few Senators here; I see no members of the Finance Committee on our side of the Chamber; and so I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Page	Sterling
Bankhead	James	Perkins	Stone
Borah	Johnson	Poindexter	Swanson
Bristow	Jones	Pomerene	Thomas

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] is necessarily absent from the Senate. He is paired on all votes with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. This announcement may stand for all votes to-day.

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL], and ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] are necessarily absent and are paired, respectively, with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 2, after line 20, to insert:

SEC. 2. That there be levied, collected, and paid in addition to the tax now imposed by law a tax of 5 cents per gallon upon each gallon of rectified whisky, or other similar rectified distilled liquor, distilled or manufactured and sold or stored, or rectified in warehouse, or removed for consumption or sale within the United States: Provided, That the additional tax imposed by this section shall be paid by appropriate stamps prepared, furnished, and canceled by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have received a great many letters and some telegrams from citizens of my State protesting against levying a war tax on intoxicating liquors. I shall burden the RECORD with but one of these communications, but I should like to have read from the desk a letter from Mrs. Elizabeth Preston Anderson, a very distinguished woman, president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of North Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks that the letter to which he has referred be read from the desk. Is there objection? There being none, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NORTH DAKOTA SUFFRAGE CAMPAIGN HEADQUARTERS,
Jamestown, N. Dak., August 29, 1914.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR GRONNA: It is reported that because the war affects Federal revenues Congress is ready to put an additional tax on beer and whisky.

The original internal-revenue tax on intoxicating liquor was, as you know, a Civil War measure. It has never been possible to remove it because this tax has given the liquor traffic Government protection, and under it it has grown and flourished for 50 years.

Just now the liquor business is facing its final defeat, but a new tax on intoxicants now will give it a new lease on life.

On behalf of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of North Dakota I beg you to use your vote and influence against this measure, which will set back the temperance reform for years.

With kind personal regards, I am,
Yours, sincerely,

ELIZABETH PRESTON ANDERSON.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, on yesterday, while I happened to be absent from the Senate, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in submitting some remarks on the revenue bill, which is before the Senate, took occasion to make some comments on the appropriations of public money during the present session of Congress. I will not undertake at any length to follow the Senator in the political campaign speech which he delivered on that occasion, but I simply wish to say enough to place before the country and before the Senate the facts in respect to appropriations made at the present session of Congress in such shape as will be convenient for reference and as will present the matter accurately.

I do not mean to charge that the Senator from Utah was inaccurate in the facts which he stated, but I do feel that his remarks did not present fairly to the country the matter to which he addressed himself.

I submit some tables, and ask that they be inserted in the RECORD. The first is a comparison of appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 with those for the fiscal year 1914. In the next place I submit a statement of those appropriations which are considered by me and which in fact are extraordinary appropriations and do not constitute a part of the regular expenditures for the support of the Government.

I submit another table comparing the appropriations for 1914 with those for 1915, which I will explain briefly when I get through with the list.

I submit another table which shows, in addition to the appropriations of public money, the contract authorizations for the payment of money.

In the next place, Mr. President, I submit a table comparing the appropriations in 1913, which were made when the Republicans were in control of the Senate, with the appropriations for 1915, which dates were the ones used by the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia submits certain tables, which he asks to have incorporated in the RECORD. Is there objection? There being none, they will be printed as requested.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator disputes the figures which I submitted to the Senate yesterday in the form of a comparison?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I stated to the Senate that I believed the Senator from Utah was substantially accurate, although there are some slight corrections which should be made, due, no doubt, to changes which have occurred since the Senator's tables were made up. For instance, the river and harbor bill contains an appropriation of only $20,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is shown by the figures given by me, Mr. President. I will say to the Senator that I had the figures which I presented made up yesterday morning by Mr. Rea, who also compiled the figures which the Senator is presenting, I understand.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have no doubt that the figures were substantially accurate and were compiled by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, who also compiled the figures which I present.

Now, Mr. President, I wish at the outset, though I will not, I hope, drift into anything like a political speech, to say that I dissent from the idea that small appropriations are economical appropriations. It may be exceedingly economical to make large appropriations. The Democratic Party has never stood before the country as a party of small appropriations, but it has stood before the country as a party for only necessary appropriations economically expended. This country is great enough and rich enough and good enough to be entitled to first-class service, and the Democratic Party has undertaken to give to the country a first-class service in all departments of governmental activity. The country is progressing rapidly and its service must be enlarged to meet the demands of a growing country, and the Democratic Party has proposed, and still proposes, to meet the demands of a growing country and to supply not only as good a service as we have had in the past but a service commensurate with the growth and development and increase of population in the country.

The Senator from Utah on yesterday alluded, among other things, to the appropriation of $400,000 for the enlargement of the post office in the city of Richmond. There is great and urgent and vital necessity for better post-office facilities at Richmond, and I would be glad, Mr. President, to see the Congress provide the money, even if they had to issue bonds, to furnish public buildings for the public service wherever they are needed; but, without any knowledge, I am sure, on the part of the Senator from Utah, he undertakes to criticize that as an extravagant appropriation. Of course he knew nothing about the facts of the case. Indeed, he characterizes every appropriation extravagant if it is an increase of a previous appropriation, a proposition from which I dissent most emphatically. I should like to see public buildings constructed in the city of Washington to provide every square foot of floor space needed for the dispatch of the business of the Government, and it would be an economical thing to do, because the Government is paying extravagant rents. More than reasonable rents are almost always exacted from the Government when it has to rent space for public work.

But, while criticizing this very necessary and economical expenditure of $400,000 which has been authorized, if not actually made, the Senator complained because an appropriation of $30,000 was not made to protect life and property in Alaskan waters, where the channels need especial care; in other words, he wants $30,000 appropriated for deepening the water on the coast of Alaska, where there are only 35,000 white people and very little use for channels and very little use for increased depth of water, but the Senator from Utah, in preaching his economy, criticizes a just authorization at Richmond, Va., and complains because $30,000 has been refused by the Congress of the United States for the reason that they did not think it necessary or economical to improve the waters adjacent to Alaska.

Again, Mr. President, the Senator from Utah criticizes the treaty which has been negotiated, but which has not been ratified, providing for paying $25,000,000 to Colombia. That treaty has not yet been disposed of, but if it is necessary to ratify that treaty and expend that money, it is to make good the useless and reckless conduct of a Republican administration, which caused this trouble with the Government of Colombia.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. So that the record may be kept straight, I simply wish to correct the Senator's statement that the proposed appropriation of $30,000 to Alaska was for the improvement of harbors. The appropriation was desired for the discovery of the pinnacle rocks, of which there are so many in Alaskan waters and which have caused the loss of so many boats. It was not alone for the benefit of the 35,000 people who live in Alaska, but for the benefit of the people who travel to and from there and the business that is done between the United States and Canada. The Senator knows that there are a large number of those rocks that are undiscovered. They are run into. Nobody is to blame. They are unsurveyed and unmarked. Nobody knows how many there are of them. That is why the $30,000 was asked for.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I did not say it was a river and harbor improvement. I said it was for the improvement of the waters adjacent to the coast of Alaska; that it was in the interest of the Alaskan people and the people who travel on the coast of Alaska. The Congress of the United States saw fit not to make the appropriation; but the Senator, while preaching economy with one breath, wailed against this economy practiced by a Democratic Congress. I do not think the Senator can make any political capital by arguments of that sort.

As to the proposed $25,000,000 payment to Colombia, I say that it is to make amends, if it is done at all, for the wrongdoing of a Republican administration. If the Democratic Party is compelled to meet an obligation caused by the conduct of a Republican administration, it comes with poor grace from a Republican Senator to get up here and criticize it, even before it is done.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator concedes that the $25,000,000 is to be paid for the wrongdoing of a Republican administration, what was the wrong that the Republican administration did?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am not going into any discussion of the course pursued by the Roosevelt administration in the acquisition of the zone on which the canal is built. It is a mooted question. It is generally believed that violent and unjust measures were used, and, as my colleague to my left [Mr. WILLIAMS] says, high-handed measures; and I suppose there is no doubt about it. There is no doubt about the fact that a strong power dealt harshly and unreasonably with a weak power. They had something that we wanted, and by indirection we took it.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Senator's position, then, it is that we wrongfully aided in the secession of Panama, and that this $25,000,000 is being paid by reason of the illegal act of this Government in favoring that secession?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is exactly my belief about it.

Mr. BORAH. And it is that position, as I understand, that the Democratic Party takes in advocating the payment of this $25,000,000?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I take the position that if the Government of the United States wronged those people we ought to make amends for it.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. Anybody would take that position—that if the Government of the United States wronged those people she ought to make amends for it. But do I understand that the Senator is now ready to take the position that the Government of the United States did wrong those people?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I take the position that that matter will be investigated by the Senate of the United States before it ratifies the treaty, and if it finds that it must ratify the treaty and pay the $25,000,000, it will be simply rectifying the wrongful act of a Republican administration.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator does not conclude himself at this time as to whether or not it was a wrongful act?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not. I shall give that matter careful investigation. While my prima facie belief, on such information as has reached me, is that a wrong was done, and that we will have to rectify it, still I do not put that in the class of finalities. I will investigate that before I vote on the treaty.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must admit that I did not touch upon the question whether it was right or wrong. I never referred to the point. I simply said that—

> In addition to the appropriations already made, there are obligations created by this Congress, either as passed or recommended as administration measures, if reports are true, and for which no appropriation has as yet been made, as follows:

Then I named the five items, amounting to $118,000,000, of which $25,000,000 was for Colombia. I do not know how I could have said it in milder terms.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will show the Senator what he said.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Senator will deny that the administration has recommended the payment of the $25,000,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator stated——

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator deny that the administration has recommended the payment to Colombia of $25,000,000?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is a matter of public knowledge that a treaty has been negotiated for the payment to Colombia of $25,000,000 as a recognition of a just claim she has against the United States for the wrongful acts of a Republican administration.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I am well within the bounds of the statement the Senator has just made, and all there is to it is that the administration has recommended the payment of the $25,000,000. That is all I said yesterday.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Let me read the Senator some language that he used on that occasion:

> The administration asks us to appropriate $25,000,000 to pay to Colombia as a gift without our receiving any return.

That is what the Senator said.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. He attacked the Democratic Party because this administration was proposing to make a gift to the Government of Colombia. I take issue with him. The United States does not propose to make any gift to the Government of Colombia. We propose to investigate and treat fairly the obligations of the United States to a sister State to the south of us. If we have wronged her or robbed her or imposed upon her in any way, it is incumbent upon us to make amends. That is what the Democratic Party proposes to do. It is for that that the Senator from Utah arraigns the Democratic Party, and says it is a mere gift without our receiving anything for it. If it is a mere gift, and if we have received nothing for it, that treaty will never be ratified.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I did not hear the Senator's speech. Is it possible that the Senator from Utah has called the attention of the country to the alleged extravagance of the Democratic Party in Congress here assembled, and put that down as one of the items when Congress has not made such an appropriation? Is it possible that he did that?

I can not conceive that the Senator would charge the Democratic administration with extravagance here, and put that down as one of the items when it was not included in the appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina did not hear my speech, nor has he even looked at the RECORD, or he never would have intimated such a thing. The Senator from Utah never stated that the amount of $25,000,000 was appropriated by this Government for Colombia.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then why did the Senator call attention to it? His speech was along the line of the extravagance of the Democratic Party.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely. I called attention to just the appropriations exactly——

Mr. OVERMAN. That is not an appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator to wait a moment. I called attention to the appropriations that have already been made, amounting to $1,115,908,777.26, and then I said:

> In addition to the appropriations already made there are obligations created by this Congress, either as passed or recommended as administration measures, if reports are true, and for which no appropriation has as yet been made, as follows.

My language was, "no appropriation has as yet been made."

Mr. OVERMAN. Why did the Senator include that in a speech against the "extravagance" of the Democratic Party?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, these are the things which, if they are carried out, and if Congress is to approve of them, will have to be paid.

Mr. OVERMAN. "If!"

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I stated; and I do not think there is any question but that some of them will be appropriated for and paid, but not at this session of Congress.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, it can hardly be charged by the Senator from Utah that it is an extravagance on the part of the Democratic Party to make honorable amends for the wrongdoing of the Republican Party.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the question.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We may have to expend not only this $25,000,000, but a great deal in addition, before we even up the scales of justice in making good the wrongs perpetrated by the Republican Party.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator repeats so many times the inference that this $25,000,000 is to pay for a wrong done by a former administration. Of course he does not give it as his definite opinion, but the inference is very plain. With the Senator's permission, I should like to state that in my opinion if the $25,000,000 is ultimately paid it will be paid to a lot of blackmailers who are undertaking to blackmail the people of the United States out of money that is not due them and never was due them.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator from Virginia will pardon this interruption, since he is writing in the RECORD facts as they are recorded—to use his excellent phrase—in common report, it is only fair that there should be added the fact that the public record discloses that the sum of $25,000,000, certainly $20,000,000, had been contracted to be paid these individuals through the preceding administration under the advice of Mr. Dubois, who was the special agent of the Government in the matter, and the sum was agreed upon prior to our coming into power. If it shall ultimately be paid by us, it is but carrying out and executing a contract which we did not make, but which was made by the Taft administration, in recognition of the wrong of its predecessor, both being Republican administrations.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I am not going to be a party to the assault being made upon the integrity of the State of Colombia. I do not want to see our neighbor despoiled and then denounced as a blackmailer until there is a thorough investigation. After that thorough investigation, if I find that she was playing the rôle of a blackmailer and withholding from us anything that belonged to us, I will never vote to ratify that treaty.

I have an idea, however—and it is an idea formed without thorough investigation—that that zone down there belonged to Colombia. It did not belong to us. We by indirection wrested it from her. It has caused bad feeling between the two Republics from that hour down to this. I am anxious to see good feeling reestablished, provided we can reestablish it by simply doing what is just and honest and right by our neighbor. The matter will be thoroughly and exhaustively and honestly investigated by the Democratic Party before the treaty is ratified.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to remark that in all probability, after the end of the European war, if indemnity is demanded by Belgium from Germany for its consequences to her, it will be denounced in the German Reichstag as blackmail.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That seems to be the order of the day.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Colorado would imply by his remark that the Government of the United States has treated Colombia as Germany has treated Belgium. There could be no greater slander pronounced against the Government of the United States and nothing more unjust, and in my opinion it borders on treason.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia further yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Like the Senator from Virginia, my mind is not made up upon the subject. I have endeavored, however, up to this time to inform myself concerning the facts and have been moderately successful. My opinion, not yet fully determined, is that it would be better for us to overrun a nation by brute force than to interfere with the strong arm of the Navy in the interest of rebellion and prevent an unoffending State, with whom we have close treaty relations of long standing, from maintaining her own sovereignty and putting down an insurrection within her borders, the more especially when those treaty relations bind us to aid, if necessary, in maintaining that sovereignty over the territory involved in the insurrection.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia further yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. I myself have given some attention and study to the situation, so far as Colombia and Panama are concerned. An investigation from an unbiased and patriotic point of view will show that the Government of the United States never did a thing that was dishonorable or improper in connection with the acquisition of the Panama Canal Zone; that it was as clean a transaction as this Government or any other Government ever had; and there is nothing that reflects the slightest discredit upon the United States or any of its officers in connection with the acquisition of the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia further yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I have not the slightest doubt that the Senator sincerely believes the truth of the statement he makes; and I earnestly hope, for the good name of the United States, that when the investigation which is to be made here shall have ended his conclusion will be vindicated, not only by the Senate but by the public sentiment of the country.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If I am not mistaken, President Roosevelt stated, with great satisfaction to himself and with great boldness and audacity, that while Congress was debating this matter he went down and took this strip of land. He has not denied that the hand of violence was stretched out against our neighbor because it was a stronger hand than our neighbor herself possessed. He seemed to be proud of that achievement in taking from Colombia something that he wanted. If, however, an investigation shows that I am mistaken in this respect and that the Senator from Kansas is right, that treaty will never be ratified. I think the people of the United States are better able to be extravagant in an appropriation than to be wrong in imposing on a weak neighbor.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia further yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. I agree with the Senator that we never should impose upon a weak neighbor, and I would not favor any governmental policy or action that would impose upon a neighbor, but I would not consent under any circumstances that the United States, because she is rich in resources, should be held up and blackmailed by a lot of bandits who assumed to represent a government which they did not honestly represent.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I think Colombia, whatever else may be said about her, has not been officious, audacious, or obnoxious in asserting her claim against the United States. She does ask us to investigate this matter and do what is right. If the Republican Party is not willing to stand by that, the Democratic Party and its voters, from one end of the country to the other, will stand by doing what is just and right and honorable with Colombia.

We are assailed by the Senator from Utah, however, because we propose to take up this matter. He does not wait until appropriations are made to criticize us for extravagance, but he criticizes us for extravagance in our purposes. Before knowing what we are going to do, he assumes that we are going to appropriate money wrongfully, and criticizes us for doing so.

Equally as unfortunate, in my judgment, is the attitude of the Senator from Utah in connection with the tolls question—the question of permitting foreign Governments to use the Panama Canal on the same terms with the United States. In these troublous times, when the whole world is disturbed with bloody war, do you not think it was a mighty small consideration that we paid, even if by the letter of the contract we need not have paid it, for the good will and the friendship and the cordial cooperation of foreign Governments, by conceding to them something which, whether all of us thought it was right or not, all of them thought was right?

If the present administration has no other ground on which to rest its claim for patriotism and efficiency and courage and devotion to the welfare of this country, I say it might rest entirely on the disposition made of the question of tolls through the Panama Canal. But the Senator from Utah attacks the Democratic Party because of that disposition of the tolls question, which has brought so much of friendship and so much of benefit to the people of our country.

Mr. President, I promised not to go into a political speech. I promised to be brief, and I am going to try to do it. I shall not undertake to comment on all of the views presented by the Senator from Utah, but I can not refrain from a few references to some other matters.

One is the item of $30,000,000 for the purchase of ships. He charges us with extravagance because of a suggestion which has been made that something should be done for the betterment of our commerce on the high seas, and a bill has been proposed, though no appropriation is proposed, except, I think, $10,000,000 of capitalization. The bill as introduced provides for $10,000,000 of capitalization, of which the Government must take the major part. Nothing has been done with the bill, however. Do you not think the Senator from Utah might have confined himself to the appropriations actually made? When he wanted to discuss the question of extravagance of appropriations, why not limit that discussion to the appropriations actually made? He will want to make this same speech next year, and he ought to have left these things for discussion then, instead of having to duplicate it by discussing it now and discussing it again next year.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think the Senator from Utah was justified in raising that point, as long as the President had recommended legislation which looked to the purchase of ships at a cost of $30,000,000, and that since the war in Europe commenced?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I suppose it might be justified on the ground that it was the best the Senator could do. I do not think it could be justified on any other ground. The appropriation has not been made. I do not know that I shall ever vote for it. I may do so. I will vote for it if I think, on careful consideration, that it will promote the welfare of the people of the United States; but I do not think I ought to be criticized—making a direct application of it—nor do I think the Democratic Party ought to be criticized, nor do I think the Democrats of the Senate ought to be criticized for a thing that they have not yet taken up for consideration.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. The party might be subject to criticism for not having taken up the matter.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator from Minnesota wants to make that criticism, it will be about like the other argument that I alluded to; he will do it only because he has not a good argument. I do not think any just criticism can be made of this Congress for not doing more than it has done. It has been here for about two years, and has worked day and night. It has done all that it was possible for it to do. I do not think any criticism can be made of this Congress for not taking up the shipping bill.

Then there is the Alaskan railroad, $35,000,000. We have appropriated $1,000,000, and we will appropriate the remaining part of that $35,000,000 whenever it is necessary, because we believe it is a great improvement, and we think it is a great economy to appropriate that amount of money for the development of that great country. The Democratic Party is not ashamed of its record in that respect. It is not afraid to submit it to the people. I voted for it, and I stand by my act. We have appropriated a million dollars, and we will appropriate the balance of it, as I say. While I have not in my mind the roll, I know there are a great many Republicans—and I think the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] was one of them—who advocated that measure. There were a great many other Republicans, good and patriotic Senators, who thought it was wise economy to construct that railroad into the great, wealthy country which we own in that northern clime.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. JONES. The Senator need not be afraid to say that I stood by that proposition. I did stand very earnestly for it; and it is one thing, at any rate, for which I can commend this administration.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. And the Senator can not commend the Senator from Utah for attacking the Democratic Party for doing what he says was right and just.

Mr. JONES. Certainly not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Virginia if the United States Government does not own practically all of Alaska? I mean by that, is not the land of Alaska now the property of the United States, and in constructing this road for the development of its resources is not the Government doing that which is necessary and essential in order to bring its property into the market and develop it?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is correct. She is simply improving her own property. That is all there is to it.

There are other items of a similar nature; but I am consuming more time than I ought to consume, and I shall try to abbreviate what I have to say.

The Senator from Utah pays a very high compliment to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] for the reduction of the river and harbor bill from $31,000,000 down to $20,000,000. I have no desire to detract from this eulogy of the Senator from Ohio, but I can not refrain from referring to the fact that pretty much all of the bad projects, if there are any bad projects, in the river and harbor bill were initiated under the leadership of the Senator from Ohio. That is another instance in which, if wrongdoing was committed, it was committed by the Republican Party; and the Democratic Party is simply making good the obligations incurred by the Republican Party for the improvement of these rivers and harbors.

Again, let me call attention to the fact—and I say this without desiring to detract from the service rendered by the Senator from Ohio—that the resolution reducing that appropriation to $20,000,000 was offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and was put through by Democratic votes, and would not have gone 10 steps if the Democratic Party had not been behind it. If it was a wise economy, if it was just and right, to reduce that appropriation bill from $31,000,000 down to $20,000,000, the Democratic Party is entitled to the credit. It furnished the initiation and it furnished the votes. If the Democratic Party had desired to do so, it had the votes and it had the strength and it had the intelligence to pass that bill just as it wanted it. It is true that the filibuster might have delayed it; but there is not power enough on that side of the Chamber to stay the march of the Democratic Party when it determines to march to success and victory. It was the best judgment of the Democrats of the Senate that that reduction should be made, and this appropriation was fixed at $20,000,000, and they executed that judgment and passed the bill and we are under no obligation to anyone else for doing it.

Mr. President, I have wandered around a little more than I ought perhaps. There is one other thing I must allude to very briefly. In the opening of his speech the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said:

> If the tariff law as it existed before the passage of the Underwood Democratic measure had been left alone and business carried on under a Republican administration and with a Republican Congress, there would have been no trouble whatever.

That is not what I was looking for, though as I read it I must call attention to the fact, which is known to everyone, that the Underwood-Simmons tariff bill had demonstrated its capacity to furnish all the money that the Government needed. It produced revenue sufficient to meet all the legitimate demands on the Government, and we were called upon to pass an additional revenue bill only when a foreign war prevented the shipment of goods into our ports and cut off the import duties.

What I was looking for I can not find; but I quote it correctly when I say that the Senator from Utah took great credit to himself for having fought against appropriations and criticizing them, large as they are, and he draws a picture of how much greater they would have been but for Republican opposition to Democratic extravagance.

My soul, Mr. President! when did it transpire that the Republican Party was opposed to extravagance? When did they raise their hands or their voices in connection with these appropriation bills when they were pending? If items were contained in them which were unjust and extravagant, and if the economy which the Democratic Party had promised was being violated, why did not the Senator from Utah raise his voice in time to stay the hand of the destroyer? Why wait until the evil was done and then come in the arena and undertake to make political capital?

For one, Mr. President, I am not conscious of having seen or heard this great effort which the Senator from Utah claims was made by the Republican Party to prevent extravagance on the part of the Democrats.

It is true that we have raised some salaries, and we ought to have raised them. This country is able to pay those who work for it, and for one as long as I am connected with the handling of appropriation bills I shall endeavor to prevent the wasteful use of any money of the United States, but I shall insist that the United States must pay just compensation to everyone who works for it. We raised some salaries, but very few.

Now, Mr. President, let us look at these figures. A very erroneous impression has gone abroad about the appropriations.

Mr. WEEKS. Before the Senator takes up that, will he yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. I have just sent for the RECORD relating to the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] on the river and harbor question. The Senator seems to take to his party associates the credit for the passage of that resolution. On that question the RECORD shows that 16 Democrats voted for it and 16 Democrats voted against it, while 11 Republicans voted for it and 6 against it. So, if there is any credit due to anyone for the passage of the Bankhead resolution, it is certainly due to the Republicans.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There were very few Republicans here attending to their business if there were not more than that number here. There ought to have been more than 17 Republicans present. I do not know how many were dodging the vote, or where they were, but according to the Senator's figures they were not present. I was well aware that there was a division among the Democrats about the matter; but a great many Democrats hesitated to vote to strike down a local improvement, although they would have voted if it had been necessary to carry the resolution.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator wishes to leave it in that form, I am willing.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I should like to leave it in that form.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator if in his opinion a vote had been taken on the river and harbor bill one month before it was taken, or before the filibuster, so called, had developed such strength, there would have been 16 Democratic Senators voting against the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am not able to answer that. I know here is one who felt great doubt about how he would vote. I had not made up my mind to vote for $31,000,000, and I know a great many other Democrats were in the same state of mind.

Mr. SMOOT. Fifty-three million dollars.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is the way it was at one time, before it was modified by the action of the Democratic committee.

Mr. SMOOT. It was only presented to the Senate modified once from $53,000,000 to $20,000,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My impression is it was offered, but did not reach a vote; but it was reduced to $31,000,000 by the action of the Democratic committee. If I am mistaken about that, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who had charge of the bill, will correct me.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to state that the committee itself voluntarily reduced the bill from $53,000,000 to $33,000,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Exactly; that is my recollection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think, $34,000,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I was not undertaking to give the figure exactly. It was reduced from $53,000,000 to $34,000,000 by the committee.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator from Texas states that the committee voluntarily reduced it to $31,000,000. I think that voluntary action, so called, was induced very largely by the opposition of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and was a result of that opposition, and that if it had not been for the determined effort of the Senator from Ohio to cut down the amount the bill would have passed the committee and the Senate by Democratic action at $53,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. The statement that that reduction was made by the committee on account of the attitude of the Senator from Ohio or the filibusterers on that side is without the slightest foundation. The committee made the reduction. I made a statement upon the floor of the Senate, and repeated it several times, representing the committee, that the committee had done this at the instance and upon the suggestion of the department, the Chief of Engineers and his assistant, Col. Taylor—that by reason of the fact that such a large part of the year had already expired, $34,000,000 would be as much money as they could spend during the balance of the year upon these works.

Mr. OLIVER and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield, and to whom?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania for a statement.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if that action was not taken after the announced determination of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] that they would filibuster against the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Virginia will pardon me, as a matter of fact the time of the reduction was after the discussion had commenced, but the reduction had no sort of reference to the filibuster. If we had been making a reduction with reference to the filibuster we could have made one that would have satisfied the filibusterers and would have reduced the amount from $53,000,000 to $31,000,000. The reductions we made were, every one of them, reductions recommended to us by the department, with the statement that after the appropriations were reduced to that exent it would furnish the department with the money that it could spend during the balance of the fiscal year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he approved of the reduction of the river and harbor bill to $20,000,000, and is it not true that after the Senate had voted upon it and the reduction was made to $20,000,000, the Senator from North Carolina most bitterly criticized the act of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I did not criticize the act of the Senate; I criticized in a speech of some length the dribbling policy for which the Senator from Ohio has always stood with reference to river and harbor improvements. I was not in favor of the $20,000,000 proposition. I voted against it. Mr. President, I believe the Government of the United States is able to improve its waterways. I believe the Government of the United States in assuming control of its waterways has assumed a duty to improve them, and I believe that the Government of the United States is able to spend the money that is necessary to improve them. I was in favor of voting the amount that the engineers recommended to us as necessary to carry on these great works.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I want to say in justice to the Senator from Ohio that his colleagues on that side of the Chamber seem to be doing him great injustice. He denied to me throughout that he was engaged in a filibuster or was willing to engage in a filibuster. He told me that many times.

Mr. SMOOT. I said a so-called filibuster.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not think the Senator from Utah ought to designate the action of the Senator from Ohio as a so-called filibuster.

But, Mr. President, we have gotten back now where I started. I stated this reduction of $20,000,000 was made after a proposed reduction had been made from $53,000,000 to $33,000,000 or $31,000,000, probably, I said.

Mr. SIMMONS. Thirty-four million dollars.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Thirty-four million dollars, or whatever it was. It was the second reduction; and I still say that what support it got on the Republican side of the Chamber was most likely due to pangs of conscience which pursued the Senator from Ohio for having initiated so many bad projects in his previous history in this body.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am very sorry that the Senator feels called upon to make a statement impugning the motive of a Senator who is not present and who, the Senator understands quite well, if present is quite capable of taking care of himself.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If I have impugned his motives, I am unconscious of it. I certainly have nothing but the highest respect and admiration for the Senator from Ohio; but many of us have done things which we afterwards regretted, and I incline to the opinion that the Senator from Ohio would not deny but that he has regretted some of the projects which he initiated during his connection with river and harbor improvements in the House and in the Senate. But, so far as impugning his motives, the Senator will have to strain his ingenuity beyond the power which it rationally possesses before he can establish that I have endeavored to impugn the motives of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not want to intrude any further on the time of the Senator from Virginia, but I think, in order that the record may be clear, it should be stated that the resolution which was presented by the Senator from Alabama is identical with the resolution which a short time previously had been introduced by the Senator from Ohio and voted down.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think the Senator is mistaken about that; but it is immaterial, and I will not enter into that discussion. If the Senator from Alabama were here, he could explain it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me a moment?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest in this connection that in justice it should be stated that the resolutions are not identical in the first place; but, in the next place, it was the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama that this reduction should be made along the lines subsequently followed by him in his resolution, and he asked for a session of the committee to be held for the purpose of considering that proposition. It was at that meeting of the committee that the suggestion was first made, and following the meeting of the committee the proposition to some extent came into the Senate through the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator from Florida will make an investigation, he will find that the resolution which was actually adopted was in the handwriting of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SMOOT. And I want to add my testimony to the statement just made by the Senator from Massachusetts. I will further add that the Senator from Ohio stated to the Members on this side of the Chamber that he had given it to the Senator from Alabama and it was his identical resolution. The amendment had been offered before by Senator BURTON, and the identical amendment was taken from the Clerk's desk and offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. FLETCHER. That does not alter the statement that the original idea came from the Senator from Alabama to the committee, and a meeting of the committee was held and the proposition was made to the committee. The Senator from Ohio declined to accept the proposition; he said he wanted to have time to consider it; and the committee adjourned without action. Subsequently the Senator from Ohio proposed a resolution.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that at the very time we voted upon the resolution of the Senator from Alabama making the lump-sum appropriation of $20,000,000 the Senate was considering a substitute offered by the Senator from Ohio to the bill of the committee reducing the amount of the bill from $34,000,000 to $31,000,000. That was what the Senate was engaged in doing when we adopted that resolution. The Senator from Ohio was then standing for a bill that carried only $3,000,000 less than the committee's bill.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. The Senators are entirely incorrect in the account they give here. The Senator from Alabama introduced his resolution for a $20,000,000 lump appropriation. The Committee on Commerce had a meeting. The meeting was called to consider that resolution. There was some discussion. The committee was divided. No actual vote was taken, but it was agreed that we were to meet in committee the next morning to consider that resolution, and instead of meeting the next morning, as we agreed upon, the Senator from North Carolina and his friends undertook to force the thing through by a night session. Those are the facts, and I would have remained silent if Senators had not perverted the facts. The facts were that instead of meeting the next day, as you agreed to meet, you undertook to force the bill through at the night session, and you utterly failed and gave up the ghost.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is entirely in error in his statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator from Virginia to yield to me.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator desires a word I will yield to him, but I can not see any potentiality in the question one way or the other.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Minnesota is ordinarily fair.

Mr. NELSON. You know you did not meet the next morning.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator never purposely misrepresents the facts, but the Senator is in error. The Senator is mistaken as to the meeting of the committee to which he referred. We did consider, not the resolution introduced by the Senator from Alabama but a suggestion, I do not now know where it came from, to appropriate a lump sum of $20,000,000. Now, as a matter of fact——

Mr. NELSON. You agreed to meet the next morning to consider that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Did you not preside and did you meet the next morning?

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. NELSON. Did you not resort to the tactics of a night session?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; not any of those things. We decided to meet the next morning. Before the next morning arrived we determined not to meet, and I went to the Senator from Ohio and explained the situation to him. It was not necessary to meet because we could not agree upon that proposition.

The resolution of the Senator from Alabama had not been introduced at that time. As a matter of fact, the Senator's resolution was introduced here about night and we passed that resolution before we had an adjournment. Therefore it was impossible for us to have had the committee meeting the Senator refers to after he had introduced the resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I thought the resolution was BANKHEAD's child, but if it was BURTON's child he could not raise it, and BANKHEAD had to take charge of it and raise it. It was a pretty healthy child and it got along very well; the Democrats passed it, and it could not have been passed without them.

Now, Mr. President, after that diversion into those matters, the particular consequence of which I am unable to take in, I will refer to some figures, as the charge is being made that the Democrats have been very extravagant in their appropriations.

The appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 aggregate $1,115,908,777.26. The appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 aggregated $1,098,678,788.40. Deducting the one from the other, we find that the appropriations for 1915 for all purposes were just $17,229,988.86 more than for the previous year. In round numbers the aggregate of all appropriations for the year 1915 are only $17,000,000 greater than they were for 1914.

Before I proceed further on that line, I must again call attention to the fact that if there was any extravagance in these appropriations it was as much incumbent on the Republican Senators to point out this extravagance and prevent their passage as it was the duty of the Democrats. I fail to recall any uprising on the Republican side of the Chamber against the appropriations contained in those bills.

I think, Mr. President, it is a credit to the Republicans that they did not rise up against them, because they were just and right, and they could not gainsay the justice and right. They held their tongues and did not oppose, but in many instances voted for the appropriations as they were made. Many of them were made at the instance and at the initiation of the Republican Senators.

Mr. President, this increase of $17,229,988.86 over the previous year is more than made up by extraordinary appropriations; so in truth and in fact there was great economy. There was a reduction in the regular appropriations of the Government as against the appropriations made the previous year.

Let us see what some of these extraordinary expenses were.

Treatment and extermination of hog cholera, $600,000. Are the Senators on that side from the great West, where pork raising is a great industry, criticizing the appropriation of $600,000 to exterminate hog cholera? It is not a regular appropriation; it is not usual; it is extraordinary. It was made to meet a great contingency, and it was to protect the people of the great West chiefly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Republicans needed it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Not only the Republicans needed it, but the Democrats needed it. The Democrats wanted the Republicans and their brethren in the same party to have it, and all voted for it because it was right. That is an extraordinary appropriation, and it makes a part of the $17,229,988.86 excess over the previous year.

Railroads in Alaska, $1,000.000. I think the Republicans, with rare exceptions, voted for it, and voted for it because it was right. That was an extraordinary expenditure. It was not one of the regular expenditures of the Government.

Again, relief of destitute American citizens in Mexico, $40,152.47. Does the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] begrudge that expenditure? Does he remember how earnestly and eloquently he appealed for something to be done for the relief of citizens of Utah who had cast their fortunes in the Republic of Mexico? That is an unusual and extraordinary expenditure.

Transporting and caring for Mexican interned soldiers and refugees, $670,000. I do not think there was a vote in the Senate against it. It was a necessity growing out of the extraordinary situation, and it was not a regular ordinary appropriation of the Government.

Mr. President, there were increases in the Army and in the Navy. I can not demonstrate that these large increases in the deficiency bill for the Army and Navy were due entirely to the Mexican war, but the circumstances, I think, to a reasonable degree of certainty demonstrate that fact, and I put them down, too, as extraordinary expenditures.

Deficiencies in the Navy on account of the Mexican situation again.

Relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens in Europe, $2,750,000. That was an extraordinary appropriation, brought about by the appalling catastrophe that is startling the whole world now. Is any man willing to say that that was an extravagance, and will he reproach the Democratic Party for not practicing economy by not cutting off that relief for American citizens in foreign countries, and in view of the fact that a large part of it will be returned to the Treasury of the United States?

Establishment of Bureau of War Risk Insurance, $5,100,000. Do you not think that was an economical expenditure? Every dollar of it will come back and perhaps with a profit to the United States. It is simply the exercise of governmental power in a great emergency to protect the commerce of the United States and to enable the products of the country to be marketed in foreign countries, where there is a demand for them and where ships would not go unless they were insured.

These extraordinary expenditures amount to $29,381,156.57. They alone blot out the excess of $17,229,988.86 and leave $12,151,167.71 less than were expended the previous year.

Where is the charge of extravagance and recklessness? We expended for the ordinary purposes of the Government less than we have been accustomed to expend.

But, Mr. President, that is not all. The Post Office appropriation act was increased in the 1915 appropriations over the appropriations of 1914 by $27,988,396. The items of extraordinary appropriations to which I have referred not only wiped out the excess of $17,229,988.86 but left a balance in favor of 1915 as against 1914 of $12,151,167.71; and omitting the increase in the Post Office appropriation act, we find the appropriations for 1915, $40,139,563.71 less than 1914. In other words, Mr. President, you take off the extraordinary appropriations, $29,381,156.57, and take off the increase in post-office expenses, $27,988,396, due to the parcel-post business and extension of service, an extension which pays a profit under the administration of the Post Office Department by the present incumbent of the office of Postmaster General, the appropriations for 1915 are $40,139,563.71 less than for 1914. The Postmaster General for the first time has shown an actual profit. It is run no longer at a cost to the Government, but it is run at a profit to the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. That, of course, is a comparison of the two Democratic appropriation bills, but I, in my comparison, used the appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, which was the last appropriation bill made by the Republican Congress, the Senator must admit.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am coming to that, Mr. President. I have the papers here to show the comparison.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say to the Senator——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am giving the advantage of this year over the last year and then the last year over 1913, showing that there has been a progressive improvement on the Republican administration.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a progressive increase of appropriations?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No, sir; it is diminished when you allow for the extraordinary appropriations and the development of the Postal Service.

Now, Mr. President, if you will bring into the computation contracts of authorization as well as actual appropriations, the balance is still more favorable to the year 1915.

In 1914 there were $68,505,174 of contract authorizations, and in 1915 there were only $28,060,000 of contract authorizations, the decrease of appropriations and contract authorizations in 1915 as against those in 1914 amounting to $23,215,185.14.

Mr. President, I hazard nothing in saying that no fair-minded man can examine these appropriations without coming to the conclusion, if the extraordinary appropriations which have been brought upon us by conditions in Mexico and conditions in Europe be eliminated, that the expenditures of the Government have been reduced.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to say to the Senator from Virginia that all of these appropriations were made before anybody ever thought that there was going to be a war in Europe. The bills had passed the House and the Senate and they had actually been signed by the President before the 1st day of August; and nobody knew that there was going to be any war in Europe until after the 1st of August.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I am attributing only a very small part of these expenditures to the war in Europe; but we have appropriated $2,750,000 to provide for destitute Americans in European countries. Does the Senator from Utah undertake to say that that was done before the war in Europe commenced? We have appropriated $5,100,000 for the insurance fund. Does the Senator from Utah claim that that was done before the war in Europe commenced?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to say to the Senator from Virginia that in the statement I made to the Senate, if he will look at the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD he will see it shows the million dollars that was appropriated for the American people in Europe. Nobody has undertaken to say that that million dollars was not appropriated for the American people in Europe; but the Senator knows also that that appropriation was not to cost the Treasury one cent, but that it was all to be returned to the Treasury of the United States, for, if the Senator will remember, when the bill was under consideration I said that I thought perhaps it would not all be returned, but that perhaps there might be some loss to the Treasury Department, but the department assured the Senator that there would not be any loss.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I was answering the statement which the Senator from Utah made on the floor at this moment. I was not referring to the past or to the papers the Senator filed. He stated positively that all these appropriations I was discussing, at least that many of these appropriations—and I think he said all of them—as appropriations resulting from the European war, had all been made before there was any European war. I called his attention, from memory, to two items—one of $1,000,000 and the other of $5,100,000—of appropriations made recently, after war was flagrant all over Europe. But, Mr. President, this $2,750,000 which the Senator from Utah says will all be returned was included in his statement of appropriations, and he did not take it out. It makes up a part of the aggregate which he flaunts before the people of the country to prove Democratic extravagance.

The Senator from Utah seems to think that whenever an appropriation is increased it is evidence of extravagance. He offered no argument and no evidence and not one word to prove that it was extravagant, but he simply showed where there was an increase, and from that he deduced the fact that it was extravagance, and he denounced it. To such a proposition I am absolutely inimical. Increased appropriation is oftentimes exceedingly economical.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to take up the time of the Senate to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to many items of extravagance, but I called attention to them in my speech. I do not want to take up any more of the Senator's time now in calling particular attention to them, but the mere fact that the appropriations this year are $96,000,000 more than the appropriations made by the last Republican Congress certainly demonstrates the proposition that there have been extravagant appropriations.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, that is a non sequitur. I do not think it is any evidence of extravagance at all. It is true that the appropriations in the aggregate for 1915 have been $96,496,060.35 greater than they were in 1913. Does the Senator from Utah suppose that our country can develop and grow and advance as it is advancing in industries, in population, and in all the activities of civilized life without some increased expenditures? These expenditures, I say, have increased over $96,000,000 in the aggregate, but that increase of $96,000,000 was not to cover these increased activities and these developments, but these increased appropriations were made to meet extraordinary conditions.

Among other things, the post office appropriations in 1915 exceeded those of 1913 by $41,935,068; there was, in round numbers, $41,000,000 of increase in the development, improvement, and extension of post-office facilities, especially including the parcels post. Does the Senator from Utah expect that to go on without increased appropriations? Is it extravagance? Is it not a greater economy to enlarge that service, which is the only department that is working at a profit and paying money into the Treasury of the United States? Forty-one million dollars of the ninety-six million dollars covered by the increase of the Postal Service was for the convenience of the American people. The Democratic Party stands for giving the very best service to the American people, whether it is Postal Service or otherwise, when it is needed; and they count it no economy to save money by denying our people facilities for doing business and interchanging views with the remainder of the world.

Mr. President, that $41,000,000 and also the increased expenses of the Army and Navy, brought on by the Mexican trouble, not by the European war, should be deducted from the Senator's statement. The expenditure made necessary by the Mexican trouble, God knows, was a wise expenditure, and it is bringing good returns to the American people. When we reflect that we have kept out of the horrors of war, when we look at the devastation in all Europe, we can appreciate more keenly than ever the wisdom of this administration in steering the ship of state so as to avoid hostilities even with our neighbor Mexico.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is it not a fact that we landed American marines and took possession of a Mexican city and are now holding it as a hostage for the good behavior of all of the various statesmen bandits and military leaders that are now operating in chaotic Mexico?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I remember when Republicans on the other side of the Chamber were clamoring for an aggressive policy and wanted an army marched to the City of Mexico. I believe, Mr. President, in that old adage of praising the bridge that takes us safely over.

I am not going into the discussion of the history or of the philosophy in connection with the Mexican situation. I say the President of the United States and the Secretary of State have brought us safely through a trying ordeal and have averted the dangers and desolation which always follow war. I praise the bridge that safely carries us over. I say the thanks of this country are due the President of our Republic for his wise and statesmanlike management of this Mexican situation so as to have avoided war and trouble of every sort.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] was first on the floor. I will first yield to him if the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] will wait a moment.

Mr. BRISTOW. Was it not the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] who, in a very eloquent speech which that Senator delivered here, first demanded that we march the Army into Mexico?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If you want a controversy with the Senator from Missouri, wait until he comes in, and then invite him into the arena. I am not going to take up the cudgels for him; he is able to do that for himself; and he is able to do it when challenged by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. If I remember correctly, if the Senator will pardon me, the senior Senator from Missouri and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] are the two Senators in this Chamber who have been demanding that we have war with Mexico.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Excuse me just one moment. It must be remembered that before Mr. Taft retired from the Presidency, he put a line of soldiers along the boundary in Texas, ready evidently to strike a blow, and when the present incumbent of the White House was inaugurated the cry was not for war, but for peace. He has steered clear of war, and he is entitled to credit for the results we have achieved. He is being glorified from one end of the United States to the other for averting war and bringing the country safely through that trouble.

Mr. BRISTOW. Did not the present President of the United States take the soldiers who had been placed along the border in Mexico and send them into Mexico and take possession of the greatest port which Mexico has—Vera Cruz? Are they not there now holding in that country, at peace with us, the greatest port that that country possesses, in defiance of every law of peace and order between friendly nations? And this is done with professions of peace and friendship on his lips.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Oh, the President sent a few thousand troops down there; he kept off armed conflict with the Republic of Mexico; he preserved the lives of American citizens; and he is entitled to great honor for doing so. With the least cost of blood and money that was possible, he averted war. We are at peace with Mexico. We have a few troops down there now, but you may rely on it that the President will withdraw them just as soon as it can safely and properly be done.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. OLIVER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not want the Senator from Virginia to make the statement he has made and to have it go unchallenged, that the Republican Party wanted the President to march our troops into Mexico.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Utah might save himself that trouble. I never said anything of the sort. I said many Republicans on the other side of the Chamber were clamoring for a strong policy, and saying that an army ought to be marched to the City of Mexico. Many of them have personally told me that. The Senator from Utah no doubt remembers when there was a strong feeling among Republican Senators in favor of an attitude of that character. I did not say that the Republican Party was responsible for it; but I said there were many Republican Senators who clamored for armed intervention and for the marching of an army to the City of Mexico. I am sure the Senator from Utah will not gainsay the correctness of that statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield further?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if the Senator from Virginia makes the statement, I have not anything further to say, because I do not believe the Senator would make it without knowing it to be true; but I will say that so far as I personally am concerned I have heard but one Republican make that statement, and that was the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. How about the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]? I see him in the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. I have said, Mr. President, a number of times upon the floor that I approved of the nonintervention policy in Mexican affairs of President Taft. I have also stated that I approved of the nonintervention in Mexican affairs by the present administration. It is farthest from the thought of most Republicans, or of all of them of whom I know anything, with the exception of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], to enter Mexico and to become involved in a direct war with that unfortunate and unhappy people.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia a short time ago alluded to the happy results of the policy of the President and of the Secretary of State in restoring peace to Mexico, or he said something to that effect. I read in this morning's newspaper the following:

NACO, ARIZ., October 12.

The Ninth and Tenth United States Cavalry, under Col. C. A. P. Hatfield, were lined up along the international boundary to-day to prevent the Villa and Carranza factions from again bringing their warfare upon American soil.

I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia whether that is one of the happy results of the policy of the present administration with regard to Mexico, and if that is one of the items of pacification that has followed that policy?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Well, Mr. President, conditions down there are not entirely satisfactory now and they have not been satisfactory for a long time; but I say that the President of the United States is entitled to great credit for maintaining peace. We are not at war with Mexico, and we have not been at war with Mexico; but we have protected the lives of American citizens and we have measured up to all the just demands that could be made upon us on behalf of our own citizens or the citizens of foreign countries in Mexico. We have done that, and we have preserved peace; and I say all praise to the administration that has weathered that storm and has brought us to the point where we find ourselves now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Virginia is, of course, in error in assuming that at any time during the Mexican difficulty I have favored either the United States making war upon Mexico or intervention in the form and manner in which it has taken place. The truth is that I would have avoided interfering in any way in the internal affairs of Mexico. I would, however, have guaranteed the liberty of our own citizens and their rights of property in every possible and practicable way.

I was opposed to the modification of the neutrality law so far as the exportation of arms into Mexico was concerned. I did not favor the modifications as proposed by President Taft, and I remonstrated against the modifications proposed by President Wilson. My attitude toward Mexico has not been concerned in any manner whatever with warfare against that country or its people at any point; and I know the Senator from Virginia will cheerfully accord to me the honor, if it is an honor, of having maintained that consistent position throughout.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Senator states frankly what his attitude was. I had only a general recollection that he felt there was not quite force enough used down there, and I had an idea that he wanted war.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. But I think the Senator wanted a little more force used than President Wilson was willing to use.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I wanted our own people protected.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. But we could not protect them with doves. If we protected them any more than we did, we would have had to do it with shot and shell. The Senator knows that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, we could at least have shown a little more solicitude for them than we did.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We were constantly showing solicitude.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There has been no courtesy shown to American citizens by either President Madero or Gen. Huerta or the present Government of Mexico. I have not been satisfied with either.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I am thoroughly satisfied with the result which has been attained. I do not know who could have done any better. It is very easy to criticize, but it is mighty hard to construct. I think a trying situation presented itself, and the President of the United States and the Secretary of State handled that situation with great wisdom, forbearance, and success, and to-day we have as good relations as can possibly be had with a country that is undergoing the revolution which is going on in Mexico.

The trouble in that country has increased our appropriations not only for the Army and the Navy, but in many other respects, and when in comparing the appropriations for 1915 with those for 1913 we find that the aggregate amount appropriated in 1915 was $96,496,066.35 more than the amount appropriated in 1913, if we will deduct from that the increase of appropriations for the Army and the Navy made necessary by the Mexican trouble, if we will deduct also the increased cost of carrying on the business of the Postal Service, which amounted to over $41,000,000, practically $42,000,000, and will deduct the other extraordinary expenses amounting to $29,381,156.57, a list of which I have read to the Senate, we will find that the items properly to be deducted amount to $103,020,432.94, leaving the appropriations for 1915 $6,524,366.59 less than they were under the last year of Republican administration in 1913.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, whenever I present any statement to the Senate I always like to have an absolute reason for it. The increased appropriations for our Navy were $21,643,708.85, as stated by the Senator from Virginia; but, Mr. President, we did not build war vessels because we did not have enough to protect ourselves against the Mexican Government. It was not on account of the Mexican difficulty that those increases were made.

I want also to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the increase of $10,000,000 in the appropriations for the Army was not due to the fact that we did not have soldiers enough to go into Mexico in case we had war with Mexico. To take care of and feed the Mexicans who were driven from Mexico on to American soil by Gen. Villa, the refugees being a part of the Huerta army, did involve an extra expense to this Government of about $2,000 a day. That was chargeable to the Mexican difficulty; but, so far as the increase of $21,000,000 in appropriations for the Navy is concerned, we never appropriated that amount because of the fact that we had to have extra war vessels to protect ourselves against the little tubs—three of them, I believe—that Mexico had.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, nobody has claimed that we had to build ships because of the trouble with Mexico; but everybody knows that we have had a great increase in naval expense because of the trouble with Mexico. We had almost our whole fleet down there on the coast of Mexico; we had troops down there, and we had troops on the border in Texas; all of which involved a great deal of expense. Does the Senator undertake to stand up here and tell the Senate that we have not incurred any additional expenses because of the trouble with Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I undertake to say that our troops now on the borders of Mexico were placed there by President Taft at the time the appropriations were made for the year 1913; I undertake to say that every battleship that has been in Mexican waters would have been in some other waters if it had not been in Mexican waters. I will admit that, if they had fired a shot—they have not, however, fired a shot, so far as I know, because of the disturbance in Mexico—it would have been an extra expense to the Government; but whenever there is a battleship afloat we know that its officers and crew have to be maintained and the ship has to be kept in condition. So far as the Army is concerned, the Army has not been increased, and the pay of the officers and soldiers goes on whether they are on the borders of Mexico or whether they are in camp anywhere in the United States, and therefore that is not an extra expense.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Well, Mr. President, of course it would be useless for me to argue with the Senator from Utah on that subject. It goes without saying that there has been a great increase in the expense, owing to the trouble with Mexico, in handling, supplying, transporting, and equipping our naval vessels and our soldiers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to put into the RECORD the resolution reported by the Democratic side of the Senate at the time the crisis occurred, which resulted in sending our soldiers to Vera Cruz, and also the resolution which was reported by the Republican side of the Chamber on the same occasion.

I do this for the purpose of showing that, while the Members on the Democratic side of the Senate were simply upholding the hands of the President in taking such moderate steps as were necessary to prevent further bloodshed and to assert the dignity of the United States, the Republican side of the Senate permitted itself to support an inflammatory resolution, which, if adopted, would have been little short of a declaration of war against Mexico, and would almost inevitably have resulted in a bloody and expensive war.

If that is the case, it does not appear that the Republicans at the present time are in any position to twit the Democrats with extravagance and excess in taking the very moderate and successful course which was taken by the occupation of Vera Cruz, which has resulted satisfactorily.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator interrupts me, let me read the Democratic resolution which was adopted by the Senate at that time, notwithstanding the opposition of our Republican friends on the other side of the aisle. This was the resolution, I think, as finally adopted:

> In view of the facts presented by the President of the United States in his address delivered to the Congress in joint session on the 20th day of April, 1914, with regard to certain affronts and indignities committed against the United States in Mexico: Be it
> Resolved, etc., That the President is justified in the employment of the armed forces of the United States to enforce his demand for unequivocal amends for certain affronts and indignities committed against the United States.
> Be it further resolved, That the United States disclaims any hostility to the Mexican people or any purpose to make war upon Mexico.

That was the resolution which was reported by the majority in the Senate at that time; that was the resolution which was antagonized by the Republicans. Now let me read the resolution which was introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and, as I recall, was very generally supported upon the Republican side:

> That the state of unrestrained violence and anarchy which exists in Mexico, the numerous unchecked and unpunished murders of American citizens and the spoliation of their property in that country, the impossibility of securing protection or redress by diplomatic methods in the absence of lawful or effective authority, the inability of Mexico to discharge its international obligations, the unprovoked insults and indignities inflicted upon the flag and the uniform of the United States by the armed forces in occupation of large parts of the Mexican territory have become intolerable.
> That the self-respect and dignity of the United States and the duty to protect its citizens and its international rights require that such a course be followed in Mexico by our Government as to compel respect and observance of its rights.

Mr. President, I undertake to say that that was an inflammatory, ill-considered resolution, and would have led to war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And vituperative.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It would have led to bloodshed and enormous war expenditures. Can the Senators who supported such a resolution now come here and twit the administration with the expenses, the very moderate expenses, incurred to preserve peace, and at the same time maintain the dignity of the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I hope the Senator will not take very long, as I am anxious to conclude.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Nebraska certainly is mistaken if he thinks I have twitted the Democratic Party for what little expenditures they were put to in the protection of American citizens in Mexico. I want to say to the Senator that all I said was that the additional expenditure of $21,000,000 for the Navy was not due to the war in Mexico nor to any trouble down there. I also stated that the $10,000,000 increased appropriation for the Army was not due to the troubles in Mexico.

The Senator refers to the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. The Senator from Nebraska and I disagree as to the object of that resolution. The only thought in the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts, in the mind of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and in the minds of those who supported it was that if we did go to Mexico or if we did set foot upon foreign soil, for history's sake we ought to give the reasons for our action. The Senator from Nebraska knows that there were tens of thousands of American citizens driven from Mexico. There were hundreds of them killed, butchered in cold blood; and I myself represent a State which had over 10,000 people with as good farms as ever were——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will let me get through.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator objects, I certainly will not interrupt him further.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not object to any reasonable statement, but I do not want the Senator to keep me standing here all the evening to make a speech. I should like to finish.

Mr. SMOOT. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not intend to make a speech and was nearly through, but I will not even conclude what I was about to say.

I know, however, and I want to say to the Senator now, that there was no intention upon the part of any Republican Senator to have the Army of the United States enter into war with Mexico. Nobody had that thought. I want to say to the Senator, also, that while that resolution was under discussion in this body our troops were at Vera Cruz, and some of the men had been killed before ever the resolution was passed. I want to say to the Senator, too, in that connection, that if I had had my way I would have seized every gunboat of Mexico, and I would have held them until Mexico had apologized to the United States for the insult that was heaped upon the American flag.

That is the ordinary course for countries to take whose flag has been insulted. I could at this time call attention to a number of cases. I am not even criticizing what has been done in Mexico. I said right along that if that was thought best to be done, if it was done by the administration, I was going to stand by the administration as far as it acted in war, because I do not care whether it is a Democratic administration or a Republican administration; when it comes to a question between a foreign country and my own, I am going to support my own country and the administration standing at the head of affairs at the time that trouble happens.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think the Senator from Nebraska should have stated, in connection with the reading of the resolution, that at the time the resolution was under consideration the President of the United States had ordered the marines to land at Vera Cruz. They were there. The battle was going on. Our marines were being killed. The senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who were the authors of the resolution, stated that if we were to have a war—and at the very moment the resolution was being considered a state of war was in existence—we ought to state some legitimate reasons for war.

I think it would have been nothing but fair to those Senators, who are absent, that that should have been stated in connection with the reading of the resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator should bear in mind that at the time the resolution was introduced in the House and passed by the House, and at the time it was reported by the committee in the Senate, there was no such state. That state only intervened because the Senators upon the other side unduly delayed and procrastinated the consideration of the resolution, apparently for political effect. There was no reason why it should not have been promptly passed by the Senate. An emergency existed, and the President and his close advisers were aware of the fact that certain emergencies required early action; and it was only for that reason that the resolution tardily passed the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will remember, the emergency that was announced here in the Senate was that there was a shipload of arms from Germany that was to be landed at Vera Cruz, and to prevent the landing of that shipload of arms it was necessary for the President to take the port, which he proceeded to do, and then permitted the ship quietly and sedately to sail to another port and land the arms, so that the murder of a number of our marines was fruitless and without result.

For one, I voted against interference in Mexico by armed force. I was opposed to taking the port of Vera Cruz, because I believed it was a hostile act upon a friendly country, and I wanted our Government to keep out of Mexico and let the people of Mexico settle their own differences in their own way. It is their own Government, and nobody has authorized us yet to dominate and domineer them.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me to make a brief observation?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will, if the Senator desires it, but I shall be through in three minutes.

Mr. STONE. I should like at this moment, with the indulgence of the Senator, to say that after having listened to a part of the speech of the Senator from Utah, delivered a few minutes ago, in which he told us what he would have done, if he had only had a chance, during the more acute period of our troubles with Mexico, and after listening to the somewhat boisterous declamation of the Senator from Kansas, it is almost enough to make the cold shivers chase up and down a man's spinal column when he reflects what might have happened if the Senator from Utah had been President instead of Woodrow Wilson, and if the grim-visaged Senator from Kansas, who shakes his gory locks so frantically in times of piping peace, had been Secretary of War or in command of the military forces of the United States. It makes one shudder to think of what might have happened and what the situation might be to-day, with armed legions tramping over the cactus plains of Mexico, with swords flashing and cannon belching death upon the poor and helpless people there.

When I think of this frightful scene and contemplate the dread things that might have happened, I am more grateful than ever to a peace-loving Heaven that Woodrow Wilson is President instead of one of these belligerent Senators.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, we may have lost a great deal by not having these two distinguished Senators at the helm at this perilous time, but the American people are satisfied with what has been done. I have no doubt those Senators would have patriotically performed the duties before them as they saw them, but I think we got along mighty well with Woodrow Wilson, and I think the country is satisfied with the way he met his responsibilities. I do not believe there has ever been an era in the history of our country when troublous times have been bridged over so successfully and with such credit and honor and such praise from the American people as in the contingency referred to.

When I took the floor I did not think I would consume more than 15 minutes. I do not know how long I have held it, but at least a good part of the time has been occupied by others. I simply desired to advert briefly to some parts of the political speech made by the Senator from Utah, and I desired to present to the Senate and to the country in convenient form the facts about the appropriations made at the present session of Congress.

Summing it up, I will say that eliminating the extraordinary expenses and the enlargement of the Postal Service the appropriations have been diminished instead of having been increased. We have appropriated less money for the fiscal year 1915 than we did in 1914, and we even appropriated $6,524,366.59 less money in 1915 than the Republicans appropriated in 1913. As I say, this is eliminating the extraordinary appropriations and the increase in appropriations for the Army and Navy and those made necessary by the parcel-post system and the enlargement of the Postal Service. The Postal Service, as my friend to my right [Mr. GORE] says, is conducted at a profit. It not only pays its own way, but it turns money into the Treasury of the United States. The Democratic Party has made the appropriations necessary for the advancement of that service, and it has made the appropriations necessary for every department of the Government. The Democratic Party considers it true economy to provide a good service to the people of the United States, but to waste not a dollar, and we have performed that duty, in my judgment, faithfully and well.

ALASKA COAL LANDS.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] if he will not now agree to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business or ask to have it temporarily laid aside, in order that the conference report on the Alaska coal-leasing bill may be taken up?

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator think we can finish the consideration of that report this evening?

Mr. MYERS. That is my judgment. I can not answer positively.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] suggests that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] is not present, and I rather think he would like to be here when the conference report is called up.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to have him here. I will send for him at once. I told him I was going to call it up this afternoon.

Mr. SIMMONS. Would not the Senator have time enough to pass it after 5 o'clock? If he does not finish it to-night, it could be resumed in the morning.

Mr. MYERS. I can not say as to that, of course. I do not know what opposition there will be.

Mr. SIMMONS. If that would suit the Senator, I should be very glad if he would let us go on until 5 o'clock.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I hope the matter will not be postponed with the idea of taking up the conference report at 5 o'clock. I should like to be here when it is taken up; but while I have been in attendance on the Senate pretty regularly, I think, I have to leave a little before 5 o'clock this afternoon, and I can not be here then. If it is not proposed to take up the conference report now, I should rather have it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. Would the Senator object to taking it up at half-past 4 o'clock?

Mr. JONES. I do not know how long it will take. I shall have to leave about a quarter to 5.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Washington is very anxious to be here, and I should like to have him here. He has to leave the city about a quarter of 5. I think I could get the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] by telephoning to his office.

Mr. SIMMONS. This is a matter that we have to get rid of, and I should like to adjust it satisfactorily.

Mr. JONES. I shall be here to-morrow, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. SIMMONS. Would the Senator be content to take it up to-morrow?

Mr. MYERS. I should really like to have the report disposed of this afternoon, if possible, if it is not going to bring about prolonged debate. I will state that Mr. FERRIS, the Representative from Oklahoma who has charge of the report in the House, is exceedingly anxious to leave the city in a few days, and is anxious to get the conference report over there just as soon as possible; and one day's difference might mean a good deal to him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to both the Senators that, as the Senator from Colorado is absent, I should like to go on a little further with the revenue bill this afternoon. Would it suit the Senator just as well to take up the conference report in the morning?

Mr. MYERS. If we can take it up the first thing in the morning, at 11 o'clock, it will suit me just as well. I can not say as to Mr. FERRIS, the Representative from Oklahoma. Will the Senator take it up to-morrow morning at 11?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. I will not ask that it be taken up at this time, then, with the understanding that we are to take it up to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], I think I ought to suggest just one or two propositions that occurred to me while he was speaking. No one will question his Democracy, and when he repudiates campaign declarations or campaign arguments or campaign slogans we must assume that there is good ground for doing so.

The Senator in his argument has answered all the denunciations that have heretofore been made against the Republicans by Democratic orators in charging them with extravagance. I have myself presented, with reference to the various appropriations that have heretofore been made, a great many of the arguments that the Senator from Virginia has made this afternoon in defense of the Democratic appropriations. I am not saying that his defense is not a good one, but I am glad he has overturned and practically repudiated all the charges of extravagance heretofore made against Republicans.

I was also glad to see that he has absolutely repudiated the only campaign slogan that our Democratic friends are making now throughout the country. Everywhere throughout the country appeals are being made the people to support Democratic candidates in order to stand by the President. If that means anything, it means that if those candidates are elected to the Senate or to the House they will do what the President wants them to do. The Senator from Virginia has repudiated that.

The President wants us to approve the treaty which proposes to pay to Colombia $25,000,000. The Senator from Virginia says: "I will be for that if I think it is right, and if it is not I will not" That is the correct position to take, but that is not the position the people are being urged to take in the campaign now. The slogan now is, "Stand by the President." That means: "Vote for the Colombian treaty, right or wrong. Vote for the $25,000.000, justified or not."

I am glad the Senator from Virginia repudiates that stand and says he will not vote for that treaty unless he is satisfied that it is a good thing.

Then the President has urged upon Congress, and it is stated in the papers that he proposes to insist at the next session that we shall pass a bill providing for the purchase of ships, and appropriating $30,000,000 for that purpose. They say: "You must elect Democratic Senators and Representatives to stand by the President." In other words, "You must elect them to appropriate money for that purpose, because the President asks it, whether it is right or wrong." The Senator from Virginia, however, repudiates that doctrine, and says: "I do not know whether I will vote for that proposition or not. I do not know whether I will stand by the President or not. If I think he is right, I will stand by him, but if I think he is wrong I will vote against the bill."

That is the right position to take. That is the position that all of us can take, so far as that is concerned, but that is not the position that is being taken throughout the country. I am very glad indeed to have such a recognized leader of the Democracy as the Senator from Virginia repudiate this campaign slogan before the election comes upon us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to utter one sentence. There is so very little difference between the slogans "Stand by the President," when applied to this President, and "Stand by the President when he is right," that I think the Senator from Washington will find a great deal of difficulty in getting the country to see the difference. The President is so nearly always right that there is very little difference, if any at all.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] a moment ago, criticizing the Democratic Party and indirectly the President, told us what he would have done if he had had his way in the Mexican situation. He would have "seized all the gunboats of Mexico," and I suppose he would have seized a good many other things, and otherwise he would have resorted to hostile acts of one description or another. After that he added, "That would have been the ordinary way."

The Senator is exactly right. That would have been "the ordinary way." I think we may well afford to thank God for the fact that the present President of the United States advocates and practices the extraordinary way. We are witnessing the application of "the ordinary way" across the Atlantic right now. Our whole new American spirit which animates even our Army is different from theirs over there and our "way" is different too.

When we entered Vera Cruz a few snipers shot a few American soldiers. We did not think a uniformed man had any rights sacred because of his uniform. We could understand how even an ununiformed one in a mistaken spirit of patriotism might shoot at us—not many, but one here or another there. We caught the snipers when we could, and we punished them. When we could not, we let the people alone. The "ordinary way" in war seems to be what took place in Louvain, in Belgium. If a man in citizen's clothes snipes a man in a uniform, "the ordinary way" is, if you can not find that particular citizen, to arraign five or six other citizens and kill them; and if the sniping was done from a house, why, kill everybody in that house and then burn the house down. Give notice that you will destroy a whole town if any inhabitant shows a hostile spirit. Thank God, we are getting away from "the ordinary way." The world is beginning to wake up and get more civilized than it used to be. I am glad the President of the United States has sounded the keynote that "the ordinary way" must be no longer traveled by civilized mankind, and that the extraordinary way must take its place.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in that connection, of course, the Senator will admit that if any Government had gone upon Belgian soil and had taken the main port of Belgium, that would have been virtually a declaration of war, will he not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and if we had stopped——

Mr. SMOOT. Now, that is the radical way; but the ordinary way I had reference to was the insult to a flag, and that is all that was involved in this question at that particular time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I never had any idea of putting soldiers upon Mexican soil at all. I had no idea that we would ever be compelled to intervene. As I stated before, I have been absolutely in harmony with nonintervention.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not get up to make a speech. I simply got up to draw a parallel between the ordinary and the extraordinary way. The Senator's "ordinary way" was to have "seized the Mexican gunboats," and then, as he said in an excited way, hold them until they had made full reparation, and all that.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the mere fact of taking a gunboat, which has been done many, many, many times in the past by other countries where a flag has been insulted, is not nearly so much a cause for war between nations as to go upon the territory of a country itself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I yielded to him just for an explanation or for a question and not for a speech.

It is true that if one country seizes the gunboats of another there may be no war, but if there shall be no war it will be because the country whose gunboats are seized will not fight. That is the only reason. It is an act of war. In that connection, again following up "the ordinary way" and the new way, the extraordinary way, the Woodrow Wilson way, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] a moment ago referred to what had taken place in Colombia. He referred to our landing marines there upon the soil of a neighboring and a friendly people, who had fired no shot at us, who had done no hostile act toward us, and when the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] happened to mention Belgium in that connection the Senator from Kansas said, in an indignant, vehement, and excited, not to say vituperative, way that the propositions were totally distinct.

The only difference between what happened between us and Colombia and what happened between Germany and Belgium was this: When we did what we did to Colombia—violated her territory, issued to her an ultimatum, to wit, that if she dared to land a soldier on her own territory, or did not withdraw him, which is the same thing, we would proceed to hurt him, and that we had guaranteed only one thing—to have our way there; that our treaty to guarantee Colombian independence was "a scrap of paper"; and that the southern doctrine of secession, against which the North had fought for four years, had now become so holy and sacredly recognized by the United States that the independence of a newborn republic, born by Cæsarian operation, we being the surgeon, could be recognized in 21 hours, without its having a treasury or a customhouse, without its having a gunboat or an army—when all that took place, and we had violated the territory of the Republic of Colombia in one of its States just as thoroughly as if Great Britain had landed troops, or threatened to land them, in New Orleans during the Civil War to support the secession of the State of Louisiana, after all this, what was the difference in principle between the two occasions, the one in Belgium and the other in Colombia? The difference in consequences to follow were, of course, immense. We issued an ultimatum to Colombia, and Colombia, in her weakness, or whatever you choose to call it, yielded to the ultimatum, withdrew her troops, and withdrew her ships. Germany issued an ultimatum to Belgium, and Begium said, "No; no! You can not violate the neutrality of our country, and we will fight." Again, I say the only fundamental difference between the two acts of war was a difference in consequences, consisting in the fact that Belgium fought and Colombia did not fight. Belgium, her independence and nationality at stake, fought Julius Cæsar and all Rome. Now, again, for the same stake, she is fighting the Kaiser and all Germany.

What is the ordinary way, again? The ordinary way, I suppose, was that we would have just said to Colombia, "Oh, well, you are in there, anyhow; your presence was offensive to us; your ships in the harbor were offensive. We wanted something; we had to pass over you to get it; you stood in the way. We have what we wanted. What are you going to do about it?" But we do not belong to quite that age on this side of the ocean, under this administration of democracy and justice. We did nothing of the sort, and the extraordinary way—the Wilson way—came into play. The extraordinary way was first pointed out to us by Colombia, because she thought we followed it, and what was it? She said to the United States, "You have been the very forerunners and chief advocates of the doctrine of arbitration. You have professed to be the peace friends of the peace friends of the world. We ask you to leave to arbitration the question of what we regard as a great injury to us, a menace to our independence, and a violation of our territory." No American Government, Democratic or Republican, dared send the dispute either to The Hague or to arbitrators selected by the two parties or under the provisions of the treaties that we have made with twenty-odd countries. The Republican administration had not the moral courage to acknowledge a wrong. Before a Democratic administration came into power much had happened of engineering achievement and of public expenditures.

The President of the United States, meeting Colombia halfway as well as he then could by pursuing the extraordinary way himself, said: "If we have done you harm and damage and caused you loss without justification, we are willing to enter into diplomatic relations concerning it and see if we can not fix it up between ourselves. We can not afford to go to arbitration upon this particular question now, because meanwhile we have built the Panama Canal, and the arbitrators might decree that we got the territory wrongfully and must restore it to you; that the canal, as a part of the territory, belongs to you. We can not go that far, but we will meet you upon the diplomatic field; we will try to negotiate a treaty founded even on generous principles; and we will submit it to the Senate of the United States, a body of highly civilized, refined men, who have been so long weaned away from 'the ordinary way' which prevails upon the other side of the Atlantic that they may follow you and me in the extraordinary way—the pleasant new way of peace and amity, and friendship and harmony, and conciliation and good feeling, and the amende honorable for whatever insult has been inflicted, and damages for whatever loss has been incurred."

The Senator from Kansas had no right to grow angry because of a parallel in principle and incipiency between the cases of Belgium and Colombia. There was but one difference, in my opinion, and that was that Belgium fought and Colombia did not; and therefore, alone, we did not devastate Colombia or burn her towns. If she had fought, we would have been bombarding her towns and killing her women and children with ship shells, and killing her boys upon the land. All that saved us was because Colombia either did not want to fight or was not brave enough to fight—I do not care how you put it. Otherwise, we, too, would have had sinful acts of oppression as well as sinful tyrannical intent on our national conscience.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I have received a great many protests from good people in the State in which I live against the idea of levying a tax on alcoholic liquors, such as whisky and wine and beer for carrying on the affairs of the Government, and there is a good deal of logic and a good deal of justice in their protest. They claim that by doing so the Government is going into a partnership in the sale of drugs which are deleterious and make for unhappiness, and that in addition the people at large pay out many times the amount they receive in taking care of the people who suffer from the use of it, and that the country suffers in the long run from the deterioration of its citizens.

There is a great deal in that. The Government does go into partnership in a way with the manufactures of intoxicants, and the more intoxicated citizens we have the larger the number of men who consume alcohol, the more money we collect from that source. I do not believe, as a matter of fact, that the Government can or does make any profit by levying taxes in that way.

For that reason, and for the reason that I think it is a time when we are coming upon what I believe is almost the end of an era in the civilization of the world, when everything is going down headlong to destruction in Europe, it seems to me that this country should be shortening sail and preparing for the change.

On board ship, when a storm comes up, a good master of a vessel does not crowd on more sail because the storm is coming. He shortens sail, and he orders everything made fast. He battens down the hatches, and if there is anything on deck that is loose he knows what harm it will do when he gets into a pitching sea, and he orders it lashed down, and heads up into the wind and lays by until the storm passes.

It seems to me that in this country at this time it is our duty not only as Democrats but as citizens of the Republic, whatever our political faith may be, to cut off any unnecessary expenditures which we are now making. I am of the opinion, although I could not demonstrate it without more time, that this country could easily lop off more than $100,000,000 of unnecessary expenditures and the affairs of the Government could be conducted just as well as they are now; in fact, I believe better. I believe it is our first duty before we levy a tax of this kind at this time, when we have every reason to believe that in the immediate future and for some time to come there is going to be great financial stress and difficulty visited upon the people of this country, that it is our duty before we levy additional taxes to cut off all unnecessary expenditures. Until we do that, and until after we have investigated thoroughly and found out that we can either do so or that it is impossible for us to do so, I do not feel that we have the right to levy an additional tax to carry on the business of the Government as though we were in the midst of unexampled prosperity. I believe it is unbusinesslike. More than that, I believe it is unpatriotic. I think it is gross carelessness. I do not say that with the intention of reflecting upon anybody, but we should first make the attempt to cut down unnecessary expenditures before we levy taxes.

I notice in looking over the table which was presented, I think, by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], it may be by the chairman of the committee, but it is now in the RECORD, that among the items of appropriation there is one appropriation for a deficiency under the head of miscellaneous expenditures amounting to $29,000,000. Whenever you find an item of miscellaneous expenditures in your expense account in the conduct of public affairs it is a very good one to investigate. It should not be there. It should be definitely stated, for you may depend upon it that a correct method of handling public affairs does not permit the carrying of a large miscellaneous expense account.

It is our first duty to cut down expenditures and to manage the affairs of the Government economically, and by doing that I believe we not only can save $100,000,000, but perhaps more than that; and if we will attend to our duty otherwise and collect moneys which are due the Government at this time we would not need to pass a bill calling for the assessment of one penny of additional tax upon any business or person in this country. So sure do I feel that this stamp upon every message to be paid by the man who makes use of the telegraph lines or expresses a package to his poor old mother in some distant part of the country will irritate the people who have to pay it that, out of regard for the welfare of the Democratic Party, I would advise against doing anything of the sort at this time. If I was managing the political affairs of a party and wished it to succeed at the next fall election I would pedal very softly on taxation which would irritate the voters all over the country and would make a very close investigation as to expenditures which could legitimately be cut off. If I imposed a tax at all, it would not be until I had exhausted every effort to trim them to where they belonged before I went before the people. The people are going to resent it. There are large communities of thousands and hundreds of thousands of people in this country, especially in the South, who are suffering now literally, and I am told are being bankrupted because of the fact that they are cut off from the markets of the world. There are others all over the country in many other vocations of life who have lost their means of livelihood. There are very few who are prospering better than usual. It is a bad time to go to the people of the country with an extra tax on anything if it can be avoided.

We had better cut our expenses. How are the people of the South going to be able to stand additional taxation at this time? Immediately after this bill is passed or as an amendment it is the intention to pass a measure relieving them in some way from their distress. Their needs are real, and we have a real duty which we owe to those people to perform. I believe that the Congress should go straight about it and give them the help they need. But it seems to me it ought to cut off unnecessary expenses in order to do so. I think a close analysis would show from 30 to 40 cents on the dollar of the average expenses of the Government could be saved.

Now, then, believing as I do that our duty first lies in that direction, I am going to vote against this bill and each and every item in it. I think it is inexpedient, that the Democratic Party will not profit by it, that it will be an injury to it, and that the Nation at large will suffer in consequence of it, and that our duty lies the other way.

As for the whisky tax, this tax upon liquor, I think the Government will make no profit by going into partnership with any such trade or traffic as that. It never has in the past nor will it ever in the future. The manhood of the country suffers from it, and it costs more to take care of the results of the use of intoxicants than we can make by taxing it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before this amendment is agreed to I want to ask the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIM-

MONS] why it applies only to rectified whisky? Is there any good reason why it should not apply to distilled spirits?

Mr. SIMMONS. Rectified whisky and distilled spirits are partly the same and they are partly not the same. It was not the purpose, I will say to the Senator, to increase the tax upon distilled spirits. It was the purpose to put a tax upon rectified spirits. In the present law there is no tax upon rectified spirits as such. There is a tax upon the spirit content of rectified spirits, but not upon rectified spirits as distinguished from ordinary distilled liquors.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not see why, if we are going to impose a tax upon rectified spirits, we should not impose a tax upon distilled spirits. There is no reason that could be given why one should be taxed and the other not taxed, unless perhaps it may be that it applies more to one section of the country than another. I hope, Mr. President, that that was not considered when this amendment was agreed to by the majority.

In looking up the production of distilled spirits and rectified spirits I find that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, there were manufactured in the United States 185,353,383 gallons of distilled spirits and 108,678,542 gallons of rectified spirits.

I have thought, Mr. President, of offering an amendment by imposing the tax not only upon rectified spirits but upon distilled spirits. It will be a little more than double the tax, and I believe if that were adopted by the Senate it would be a better distribution of the burden of the tax.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I want to suggest this to his mind: There is a difference between the amount of tax really paid now upon rectified whisky and that on other or straight whisky; and although I thought it was a larger difference than this, I am informed at the Treasury Department that 5 cents per gallon on rectified whisky would equalize the two in the amount of tax they pay. So even if the Senator were going to propose to raise the tax upon distilled spirits generally, the tax upon rectified spirits ought to be at least in the proportion that 5 cents is to the present duty higher than that upon the straight whisky.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not see that that follows, because the tax is imposed upon rectified whiskies, upon the actual amount of distillled spirits in them, plus the adulteration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Here is the way it is done, as I understand it: A certain amount of straight whisky goes to the warehouse. Then the man takes it out and "rectifies" it. He puts into it distilled prune juice, distilled rotten apple peelings, sirups, some water, maybe a little glycerin, anything else under the sun, and makes stuff that is poisonous to the human stomach. A great many people think it is all poisonous, but I mean the same quantity of rectified whisky is more poisonous to the human stomach than the straight goods. He makes it out of cheaper materials, and, as a consequence, gets an advantage. He can take, say, 75 per cent of straight whisky and add 25 per cent of adulteration. Then he has 100 per cent of rectified spirits, and, in addition, has left over 25 per cent of straight whisky to form part of more rectified whisky.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the explanation of the Senator from Mississippi is about as I thought I had stated the case. I believe that wherever an article is adulterated and it is to be sold to the country as straight goods, there ought to be a tax imposed upon it, and there ought to be more tax imposed upon it than the difference that exists in our present law to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if I am right in my belief that under the present law there is no difference in the tax upon rectified spirits and that upon distilled whisky?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no difference in the amount of tax on distilled spirits and rectified whisky, but there is this difference, that whatever adulteration is added, if it may be called such—and it has been so designated by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]—it also pays the $1.10 tax.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not pay it now?

Mr. SMOOT. It does pay it now. But it seems to me that, if we are going to impose a tax at all upon whisky, it ought to be imposed upon both distilled spirits and upon rectified spirits.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would explain the difference between distilled spirits and rectified spirits.

Mr. SMOOT. The difference is this: Distilled spirits are, as nearly as can be, 100 per cent pure; such spirits are understood to be as pure when they are 100 per cent proof; but the rectified whisky or spirits is that in which there has been an adulteration, where something else has been added to the distilled spirits which is the basis of rectified whisky.

Mr. NORRIS To get rectified spirits you take the pure distilled spirits and put something else in it; then it is called rectified spirits?

Mr. SMOOT. It is then called rectified spirits.

Mr. NORRIS. You may put something in it—that is the entire difference—and you may make a gallon and a half of it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. A gallon and a quarter, about, let us say.

Mr. NORRIS. But you pay no more tax on it; is that it?

Mr. SMOOT. About a gallon and a half.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there any limit fixed by rule or by law?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no limit fixed.

Mr. NORRIS. You could rectify it almost in any way you desired?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it could be made poor or made good, so called.

Mr. NORRIS. If you take a gallon of pure distilled whisky and put a half gallon of water with it, would it then become rectified spirits?

Mr. SMOOT. No; they must add sirups and other articles.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They do put water in it.

Mr. SMOOT. They put sirups in it, and perhaps they may add, and they do add, water to make up the quantity; but I can not say just exactly what percentage of water is added; in fact, I know very little about the manufacturing of whisky.

Mr. LANE. Do they sometimes add drugs like fishberry, the cocculus indicus, or something that will make the drunk come to them quickly?

Mr. SMOOT. Not that I know of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I do not think they add as much as a half gallon; I think it is about 25 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. About a half.

Mr. NORRIS. Who determines how much they can add? How is the amount determined?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The distiller determines it; but there is a test of the strength of the whisky, you understand, made by the gauger. You take the straight whisky and you put in 25 per cent of other things, and the same tax is paid per gallon as on the straight whisky; in other words, the distiller cuts off 25 per cent of his tax.

Mr. SMOOT. But he does not get the same price for his article.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That depends on the part of the country in which he sells it. Some people are fond of what they call "blended whisky," and they pay a fancy price for it, although it is more poisonous than straight whisky. Most people do not know the difference.

Mr. NORRIS. That was the question that was determined by President Taft a few years ago in answering the question, "What is whisky?"

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the matter now exactly determined by law or by rule?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know, except that our United States chemist at that time, Dr. Harvey Wiley, I believe, was very much in favor of making the distillers put upon every gallon of rectified whisky just what they had put into it in addition to the whisky. That failed; but they did hold that some of it was whisky—I am not acquainted with the details—although it had been rectified with other elements. They may forbid it being labeled "Straight whisky" or require it to be labeled "Blended whisky."

Mr. NORRIS. For the purpose of getting the information before the Senate and for my own understanding, there is now levied a tax of $1.10 a gallon under the present law, is there not?

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. And this is on distilled whisky?

Mr. SMOOT. That is on distilled spirits.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there anything stated in the law about rectified spirits?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; and for that reason both distilled whisky and rectified whisky pay the same tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, does the Senator from Mississippi mean by that that if you had a gallon and a half of rectified whisky and a gallon of distilled spirits—straight whisky, as you call it—that you would pay on the gallon and a half of rectified whisky the same amount of internal revenue that you would on the other?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I do not mean that. What I mean is that if you took a certain quantity of straight whisky you would pay a certain tax per gallon upon it, and if you took the same quantity of rectified whisky—they are both distilled, of course—you would pay the same tax per gallon upon that. Then you would have enabled yourself to save that much straight whisky out of each barrel to make more rectified whisky, and thereby escape that much tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the present law, when is the tax levied? Is it levied before the whisky is rectified or afterwards?

Mr. SMOOT. It is paid when the whisky is withdrawn from bond.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is paid when the whisky is withdrawn from the warehouse, when it is sold.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be rectified or not, then?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It may be rectified or not.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Mississippi will permit me, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that the tax is paid upon the amount that is in the barrel at the time it is withdrawn; there is no tax paid upon the quantity evaporated.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think there is some confusion about this matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; there is a great deal.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that I can say anything to clarify it, but I should like to try. Whisky is taxed according to its proof; that is, 100 proof spirit is taxed $1.10, and 100 proof whisky is about 50 per cent of absolute alcohol. That is the difference between proof spirits and alcohol; proof spirits has about one-half absolute alcohol. A tax of $1.10 is imposed upon a gallon of 100 proof spirits. If it is desired to rectify that, the rectifier, under the present law, pays no other tax; the tax has already been paid. He receives for rectification spirits which have been taxed $1.10, 100 proof. Now, under the law he can reduce that proof by the addition of sirups and other concoctions down to 75 per cent proof. Then he sells it as rectified spirits, without paying any additional tax whatsoever. He has increased the quantity; he has taken a gallon of whisky 100 proof and has reduced it to 75 per cent proof by adding other materials to it, so that in the rectified gallon there are not all of the spirits that were in the tax-paid gallon; in fact, only 75 per cent.

The thought of the committee was that if the distiller put that upon the market and sold it as rectified spirits, sometimes called "blended spirits," and selling it in the market at approximately the same price as straight whisky, thus securing the benefit of the additions that he has made to it, possibly without any reduction in the price at which he sold it, it was proper that he should pay some tax.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He sells it as whisky.

Mr. SIMMONS. He sells it as whisky, but I think the law requires him to mark it "blended." The public, however, does not understand that the word "blended" signifies liquor at a lower proof than straight whisky.

There is another reason why the rectifier should pay a tax, and that reason is this: Every time a gallon of whisky is blended and put in a container the Government has to place a stamp upon it. That stamp the Government is now placing without charging anything whatsoever for it to the rectifier. The Government has the stamp printed, and the Government sends a public official, a deputy collector, who puts that stamp on without any expense to the rectifier whatsoever. It was thought that he should not only reimburse the Government for that expense, which amounts, I think, to something in the neighborhood of a million dollars a year——

Mr. WILLIAMS. This tax will bring in $5,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not talking about the tax now; I am talking about the cost of printing and putting the stamp on. I think it has been estimated that it costs the Government about a million dollars a year to put the stamp on rectified packages just for the accommodation of the dealers in rectified spirits; and they pay no tax to the Government whatsoever—not so much as to reimburse it for its expenses.

Mr. SMOOT. So that the Senate may understand the disadvantages which the rectifier claims he is under, I want to call attention to the fact that when he withdraws distilled spirits for the purpose of rectifying them he pays the $1.10 tax upon every gallon that is withdrawn at that time, and whatever evaporation takes place after that he loses; but the dealer in distilled spirits only pays the $1.10 upon what there actually is at the time the spirits are withdrawn from the warehouse.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But he can draw it out before evaporation or at the same stage of evaporation, just as the other man can.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but the Senator knows they seldom do that; and the Senator also knows that in some cases the evaporation amounts to 20 per cent, and has been known to amount to even more. They do not pay on the evaporation; and therefore the rectifier is at a disadvantage as to the amount that evaporates.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the rectifier pay on the evaporation?

Mr. SMOOT. The rectifier has to pay when he receives his distilled spirits on the number of gallons which he receives; but the distilled spirits when made are put in bonded warehouses and sometimes held for years, and the distilled-spirit dealers do not pay the tax until they withdraw the distilled spirits from the bonded warehouse. When they do that, they pay $1.10 a gallon upon the actual gallons that there may be at the time in the barrels.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a minute, it is true that, as a rule, straight whisky is kept in bonded warehouses longer than the whiskies that are taken out for the purpose of being rectified, but neither the man who rectifies nor the man who does not rectify pays a dollar upon evaporation which has taken place at the time he withdraws the whisky.

The man who keeps it in the bonded warehouse for a long time, and thereby has less tax to pay because of the evaporation, has at the same time done without his money for a longer period. He has held his whisky from the market a longer time.

Mr. NORRIS. But he gets a higher price for his whisky.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He holds the whisky for the purpose of making it ripe by natural processes, instead of ripening it by artificial processes, as the rectifier does. The rectifier, as a rule, takes it out earlier, and then he artificially ripens it by sirups and various other articles, and it is sold to the public as a ripened whisky.

The Senator knows that the chief poisons in whisky are what are called the volatile essences. The longer the whiskies are ripened the more they evaporate and the more these volatile poisons go off into the air and are out of the drink which is taken into the human stomach.

The Treasury Department and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue have always wanted a special tax upon rectified whisky, sufficient not only to pay for the stamps, but something more besides, and they have so recommended several times.

If the motion of the Senator from Utah should prevail and we should increase the tax upon all whiskies, then there ought to be an increase of more than 5 per cent in addition to be placed upon rectified whiskies, in order to make the two classes of people pay the same tax, predicated upon the assumption that they take the whisky out of the warehouse at the same time, which, of course, they have a right to do.

Mr. SMOOT. But which they do not do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Which, as a practical fact, for the most part they do not do, because the higher grades of whisky are kept in the warehouses in order to get the bonded warehouse certificate, which indicates natural ripeness.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will permit me, it seems to me that the argument of the Senator from Mississippi would go to show that under existing law there is an inequality existing. The remedy proposed would only be temporary; and if the Senator's theory be true—and I presume it is; I have no reason to doubt it—then this provision ought to be made permanent law, instead of being put on a temporary act, which will end at a specified time, and thereafter the inequality will continue.

To see if I understand the situation, I want to ask the Senator from Utah, or some other Senator, a question; and in order that the Senator may understand me, I want to suppose, for the purpose of the question or the illustration, that we have here two gallons of whisky upon which the tax has not been paid, one gallon being rectified whisky composed of 75 per cent of pure distilled whisky and 25 per cent of adulteration and the other gallon being pure distilled whisky. If the internal-revenue collector were there to collect the Government tax, would the owner of the whisky have to pay the same tax on each one of those gallons?

Mr. SMOOT. He would, Mr. President, pay exactly the same tax—$1.10 per gallon.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, it seems to me, if that be true, under existing law, on the impurity, or whatever is put in the whisky to adulterate it and at the same time increase its value, the rectifiers are paying exactly the same tax as is paid on the straight article.

Mr. SMOOT. And they ought to be penalized for it. I believe that that is right.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not objecting to that. What I want to get at is the exact facts, so as to see whether or not the increased tax ought to be put on both kinds alike. If that be true, it seems to me that the same tax ought to be levied on rectified and distilled spirits.

Mr. SMOOT. It certainly would have to be to make things equal as the law stands to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, the law as it exists to-day does not recognize, so far as taxing purposes are concerned, any difference between impure whisky and pure whisky?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever, so far as the gallon is concerned.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah, if I may, what his amendment is with reference to this?

Mr. SMOOT. I had not yet offered the amendment. I have been informed that this tax of rectified spirits was agreed upon in caucus, and if that is the case, of course there would be no need of my offering the amendment; but if the Senator will let me proceed now to state some of the facts as they really exist in relation to the amounts produced, and where produced, and what effect this amendment will have, I will then return to the question of offering the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator, if we ought to increase the tax on all kinds of whisky alike, we would reach that, would we not, by striking out the word "rectified," so that there would be assessed a tax of 5 cents per gallon in addition to the present tax upon each gallon of whisky?

Mr. SMOOT. I think, to make it entirely clear, it ought to be "upon each gallon of distilled and rectified spirits."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. "Distilled and rectified" will cover it.

Mr. NORRIS. All whisky is either distilled or rectified, or both, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. It is.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, if we should strike out the word "rectified," you would have a tax assessed on each gallon of whisky. Would not that include everything?

Mr. SMOOT. I rather think it would, Mr. President.

Now I wish to call attention to the fact that in the law of 1898 there was no tax placed upon either distilled whisky or rectified whisky; but in this bill a tax is imposed upon rectified whisky, and the revenue from it is estimated at $5,000,000. I can not yet understand why this was done, unless it was for the purpose of compelling the $5,000,000 which is to be received through this tax to be paid largely by the Northern States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator intimates that I am mistaken.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator that he is mistaken. I never heard, until it was suggested here on the floor of the Senate, the suggestion that there was any sectionalism in that provision of the bill. I want to say to the Senator, furthermore, that in no committee meeting of the majority Members was such a thing suggested; and there are upon the committee, I believe—counting the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] as a western Senator—an equal number of Senators representing the South and the West.

Mr. JOHNSON. And the East.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know exactly, but there is an equal number—5 and 5, I think. A suggestion of a sectional tax would have been resented, and it was not thought of.

The reason this was proposed was because the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has been for a long time suggesting that there should be a tax upon rectified spirits. That suggestion was made to the Finance Committee when we were framing the tariff bill, as I recall, but it was not put in that bill. It has been constantly urged by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I think you will find it in the reports. I know, from personal conversations with the present commissioner, that he has suggested it, and it had been suggested before that time in the reports of the commissioner.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection, then, I wish to call attention to the other items that are not taxed by this bill, and that were taxed by the act of 1898.

If the Senators will take the war-revenue bill—which, by the way, I think ought not to be designated a war-revenue bill—if they will take the document showing the comparison of additional revenue derived in 1900 and the estimated additional revenue to be derived for a year under the provisions of House bill 18891 as it passed the House and as it was reported to the Senate, they will find that rectified spirits is one thing on which the present bill imposes a tax that was not imposed by the act of 1898.

Now, let us consider the other items on which a tax was imposed by the act of 1898 and eliminated in this bill and see where they are largely produced.

First, there is tobacco and snuff. There was collected under the act of 1898, in the year 1900, $17,635,607. There is no tax whatever on these items in the bill.

Take cigars. There was collected, in 1900, $3,180,784.

Mr. SIMMONS. Did I understand the Senator to say that there is no tax on tobacco and snuff?

Mr. SMOOT. There is a tax upon the dealers in tobacco and snuff. But on tobacco and snuff, if the Senator will remember——

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not talking about the pending bill; but under the present law did I understand the Senator to say there is no tax on tobacco?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; I never referred to the present law. I said "in the pending bill."

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill that we have under consideration as a revenue measure is the one to which I referred. I was calling attention to the fact that the amount collected from tobacco and snuff in the year 1900 under the revenue act of 1898 was $17,635,607, and it is not taxed at all under the present bill. From cigars we collected $3,180,784; there is no tax whatever upon them in the present bill. From cigarettes we collected $1,320,305 under the act of 1898, but there is no tax imposed upon them by the present bill.

The next item is petroleum and sugar refiners. There was a tax of $1,079,000 collected under the act of 1898. There is nothing imposed upon petroleum or sugar refiners in this bill. It seems to me the present bill has been framed in such a way that the amount of tax will fall most heavily upon the Northern States.

Let me refer now to the item of rectified whisky.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator pardon me just for a minute before he leaves the subject of tobacco?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say that in 1898 the tax was raised from 6 cents to 12 cents on manufactured or plug tobacco. Subsequently that tax was repealed by the general law, and reduced again to 6 cents a pound. After that, I believe somewhere around 1906 or 1907—I do not recall which—we increased the tax on manufactured tobacco from 6 to 8 cents. The tax on large cigarettes was raised during the war-revenue period to $3.60 a thousand. That has been since reduced to $2.

That is the statement I wished to make as to that part of the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the revenue tax. That is the regular tax imposed under the law.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the regular tax that is now imposed upon cigars. Upon plug tobacco there is a tax of 8 cents a pound. Upon cigars there is a tax of $3 per thousand. Upon cigarettes weighing more than 3 pounds to the thousand there is a tax of $3 a thousand, and upon cigarettes weighing less than 3 pounds to the thousand there is a tax of $1.25 a thousand at present. That is equivalent to a tax of 42 cents upon each pound of tobacco in a thousand cigarettes.

Mr. SMOOT. That was the case in 1898, when the former law was passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. The tax on cigarettes was increased to a dollar and a half at that time. I am merely stating now that the present tax on cigarettes is at the rate of 42 cents a pound for the tobacco in a thousand cigarettes; the tax on cigars is at the rate of 15 cents a pound for the tobacco in the cigars; the tax upon plug tobacco is 8 cents. In addition to that, we have a tariff tax upon the tobacco that is used in the manufacture of both plug tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes.

Tobacco is to-day paying nearly one-half of the entire amount that the Government realizes from its internal-revenue taxes. Under the present law the taxes collected by the department as internal-revenue taxes amount to $79,000,000 a year. The taxes collected through our customhouses upon the tobacco that goes into the manufacture of plug tobacco and cigars and cigarettes amount to $35,000,000 a year; and the taxes which this bill carries against persons engaged in the manufacture of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes will amount to $5,000,000 more. So the total tax that tobacco is paying for the support of the Government under our present system is $125,000,000 every year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all of the taxes imposed upon tobacco, as enumerated by the Senator from North Carolina, were imposed before the war-revenue tax was placed upon it in the year 1898. We did not collect as much revenue from tobacco at that time because there was not as much used in the country as there is now; but the taxes were imposed, and notwithstanding those taxes at that time, there was also imposed upon the items of tobacco, snuff, cigars, and cigarettes a tax that yielded to the Government of the United States nearly $21,500,000. The committee, however, has seen fit to relieve those items entirely from the imposition of a revenue tax at this time.

I want to say to the Senator from North Carolina that, in view of the fact that the distilled spirits are not taxed and the rectified spirits are taxed, my statement that it was a sectional matter, and the tax would fall upon the Northern States more than upon the South, was based upon the figures showing where each is produced, and thus showing where the tax would fall if imposed. I find that the rectified spirits are manufactured largely in New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Ohio. Each one of those States produces more rectified spirits than the State of Kentucky; and I find that Kentucky produces only 7 per cent of the rectified spirits manufactured in the United States, while she produces 24 per cent of the distilled spirits, and under this tax of 5 cents per gallon on rectified spirits she would be called upon to pay $379,000, whereas if it applied to the distilled spirits she would be compelled to pay $2,100,000 of the $5,000,000 imposed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. So far as concerns the place where the rectified spirits are produced, or the place where the tobacco is produced, I do not think it has one thing in the world to do with the payment of the tax. The committee had no thought about the locality in which these things were manufactured. If there are any taxes in the world that are not paid by the manufacturer, they are the whisky tax and the tobacco tax.

The tax on a gallon of whisky is $1.10. There is not anybody that does not know when he buys that whisky that the man who buys it and drinks it pays the tax. The man who manufactured it paid it in the first instance, and in every instance he transmits it to the man to whom he sells it. The man who finally consumes it pays it eventually. That is true of whisky, and that is absolutely true of tobacco. The man who manufactures tobacco may live in New York. He pays the tax to the Government in the first instance, and then he transmits it to the retailer, and the retailer transmits it to the man who chews it or who smokes it. It does not make any difference where it is manufactured—either tobacco or whisky—the tax is paid by the people of the country in the North, in the East, in the West, and in the South just in the proportion as they drink whisky or as they consume tobacco.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the history of the revenue act of 1898. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact—and I think he will well remember it—that the packages of smoking tobacco were changed in size. I bought tobacco at that time as a merchant; and not only were the tobacco packages decreased in size, but the plug tobacco——

Mr. SIMMONS. That proves what I said, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is just the reverse of what the Senator said. The Senator, as I thought, said that the tax was not paid by the consumer.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said that the manufacturer escaped it. I do not care by what device or manipulation he escapes it; the fact is that he escapes it.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator that the manufacturer escapes it. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is paid, in the end, by the consumer.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator said there was no difference in the price at which it was sold to the consumer.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no; I did not say there was no difference in the price at which it was sold to the consumer. I said the consumer pays the tax.

One other suggestion. The Senator says, because we have imposed a tax upon rectified spirits, that we have discriminated in favor of the South. The Senator says, because we have not imposed a tax upon tobacco, that we have discriminated in favor of the South, because the South is a producer of tobacco. Now, if it be true that when we relieved the South from further taxation upon tobacco and cigarettes we discriminated in favor of the South, then when his party put upon tobacco in this country a tax of $125,000,000 it discriminated against the South in doing that. If one is a discrimination, the other is a discrimination.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not an item in the tariff bill to-day that carries a much higher protective rate than tobacco. Who does not remember the speech made by the Senator from Kansas in relation to the enormous tax on tobacco when the present tariff act was under discussion?

Mr. SIMMONS. I was referring to the internal-revenue tax.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator was referring to the internal-revenue tax, but I am referring to the fact that this Government protects the tobacco grower by a duty upon imported tobacco. I admit freely that the Republican Party has always in the past felt that it was a legitimate product to be taxed in order to maintain the Government of the United States, and there is not a civilized country on earth that does not do exactly the same thing. Even the free-trade countries, so called, imposed a higher rate of taxes upon tobacco than does the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. The point I was making when the Senator interrupted me was that if it was a discrimination in favor of the South—and that was the point he had been pressing—not to further tax it, then it must have been equally a discrimination against the South to have originally taxed it to the extent to which they did tax it. If all the tobacco in this country was made in the South, and if it is a discrimination against the country to impose a tax upon an article which is produced, then it was a discrimination when we put the internal-revenue tax upon tobacco.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it was not a discrimination against the South then, because the tax was balanced by the imposition of taxes upon items that were almost entirely made in the North. For instance, we imposed a tax upon beer, which is produced largely in the North, and that is also taxed in this bill. In this bill a tax on beer is imposed in exactly the same way.

I want to say to the Senator if he will carefully take these figures and figure out the taxes imposed upon the goods made in the North and those made in the South he will find that at least 80 per cent of the tax will come from the North and 20 per cent or less from the South. That was not the case, Mr. President, with the act of 1898, because at that time there was imposed a tax of $21,000,000 upon tobacco, snuff, and cigars. That has been wiped out, but not so with the beer tax. The tax of 5 cents a gallon on rectified spirits is provided for in this bill, the great bulk of which is made in the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and New York.

Mr. SIMMONS. It would be absolutely impossible for any man upon the face of the earth to determine exactly how much any one section of the country would pay of the taxes imposed by this bill. The majority of these taxes are imposed upon things that are done in one section of the country just as they are done in every other section of the country and the tax is in proportion to the traffic in one section and the traffic in another section of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. If it be true, as the Senator said, and it is not true, that 80 per cent of the tax imposed by this bill is imposed upon the North and East and West and only 20 per cent of it is imposed upon the South, it would be not very far short of the proportion which the balance of the country bears to the South in population, in wealth, and in business.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator says it is not true, but I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to allow the Senator himself to sit down and figure the percentage of the production of every item in this bill and let him decide what percentage is produced in the North and what percentage is produced in the South. I have given more than a liberal allowance; I am well within the bounds of truth when I state that it will be 80 per cent for the North and 20 per cent for the South. I am perfectly willing to let the Senator from North Carolina decide it himself, because I have absolute confidence that he knows enough about where the goods of this country are produced and will be at least fair, and if he is I know he can not arrive at any other conclusion.

Mr. SIMMONS. It would be impossible for the Senator, I suppose, to select any other items in the bill outside of beer and tobacco and rectified spirits where he could locate the point of production of the particular article, unless it be chewing gum; I do not know about that; I do not know where it is produced; I have never kept up with it, but wherever it is produced, it is consumed in the country. I submit as a common-sense proposition—I do not want to argue it—that the tobacco tax is paid not by the man who manufactures it, and not in the section of the country where it is manufactured, but, as a matter of fact, it is paid by the man who consumes it, I do not care where he is. The tax will fall upon the people of this country just in proportion as the habits of the people of one section demand more tobacco or more whisky than the habits of the people in another section of the country, and as to chewing gum, the tax will be borne in connection with the habits of the people just in proportion as the women and children in one section of the country chew more gum than do the women and children in another section of the country. Where it is manufactured and produced has absolutely nothing to do with the payment of the tax. As Mr. Dingley said, it is an article upon which every man can select the amount of tax that he wants to pay. If he wants to pay a big tax, he will consume a large quantity of liquor and a large quantity of tobacco. If he wants to pay a small tax, he will consume but little tobacco and little whisky.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I can not believe, I do not want to believe, I will not believe, that the committee was prompted or actuated by any thought of sectionalism or geography as to where this tax should be levied. I can not believe that. I do not agree with my fellows sometimes, but——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that that claim is absolutely absurd.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It seems to me so. I do believe and feel that the Senate of the United States is made of better stuff than to be governed by little sectional ideas, whether it shall affect the confines of my State or your State or some other State.

But I am frank to confess with reference to this rectified spirit scale, I was troubled about it when the matter was before the committee, and I there spoke of it. It does seem to me, Mr. President, that all should bear that tax, whether it be rectified or distilled spirits, and each should bear it alike. I do not know just the mystification of what constitutes rectification, but it is all whisky. It will all tend to deliriousness. It is sometimes an absolute and prime necessity, but it is a luxury at best, and I can see no reason why distilled spirits should not share the burdens of our Government and the necessities of this occasion, which are not partisan. They are not necessities made by the Democrats or by the Republicans, and they should bear this tax equally and alike.

We have raised the tax on beer to $1.75 a barrel. They write me and tell me in telegrams by the score that beer is a poor man's drink. As I said once before, I think it is a poor drink at that, but that is a matter of the taste of the man who drinks it. However, you can not get rid of the fact that there are tens of thousands—aye, millions—of people in this land and in other lands who deem beer a liquid food. Many families, whether wisely or unwisely, are brought up on it. The tax was raised from $1 a barrel to $1.75 a barrel. Many feel that this is an unfair and an unjust discrimination and burden. I can see no reason why a man who drinks whisky should not pay his share in proportion, as near as may be, to the man who drinks beer.

I feel it is unfortunate to drag this question of geography, of sectionalism, in here, but I want to say about tobacco, I think it is one of the noxious things of God's creation. I have never favored it. I can not say that I particularly rebel at the fumes of a well-flavored cigar, but I believe it is one of the things that humanity could well do without far better than people could do without alcoholic spirits. I believe the world universally and the medical profession as well would say this. But while our tax bill has taxed tobacco and has taxed tobacco hard, $4.80 on any place that shall sell tobacco, whether it be in a palace or in a modest little shop, I insist that the method of levying this tobacco tax should not be arbitrarily on the pound or necessarily on the thousand, but I think the man who buys three cheroots, or whatever you call them, for 5 cents should not pay as much proportionately as the man who buys a perfecto at 15 or 25 cents apiece. I feel that the tax on tobacco should be a graduated tax, acco ding to the value of the cigar that the man who can afford it regales himself with, so that the man who smokes a cigar costing 15 to 25 cents should pay more than the man who smokes the miserable little cheroot and makes himself believe that he is growing happy. I think there should be a discrimination there.

I believe the necessity exists for raising this revenue. I believe the promptings are broad and patriotic, but I say we should not discriminate against rectified spirits. Let us treat them all generally alike. It will double the revenue and no one will find any fault.

Mr. LANE. I would like to say, for the information of the Senator, that there is a great deal of difference between distilled spirits and rectified spirits.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not know the difference.

Mr. LANE. I have been told while the discussion has been going on, by a gentleman who has been connected with the business, that out of 1 gallon of distilled spirits they make 2½ gallons of rectified spirits by adding water, vinegar, high wines and spices, and things of that sort. That increases the quantity two and a half times. Now, if you are going to drink whisky you should drink as pure whisky as you can get and only the best you can get. It is bad enough even when you do that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will say to the Senator that it is a matter of taste.

Mr. LANE. Whisky that has been doctored in that manner is a fraud, and that, I am told, is the best rectified spirit. The rectifier without conscience, who cares not so long as he makes money, puts in tincture of tobacco, tincture of cocculus indicus or fish berries, tincture of cascarilla, and distilled spirits or alcohol, and the concoction out on the frontier is known as sheep herder's delight. One drink of it will make a man take his gun and shoot up the town, and with two drinks of it inside of him he will go out and kill his grandmother. That is the kind of a rectifier, if you are going to put a tax upon intoxicants, who ought to be taxed out of business.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator is very familiar with the matter of scientific rectification, of which I know nothing. I would like to know what would be the Senator's suggestion as to putting more tax on rectified than on distilled spirits?

Mr. LANE. I would tax it high if I was going to tax it. I do not believe in taxing it. I do not believe that the Government should go into partnership with it, and I do not believe that the people should be made to pay the expense of caring for the results which ensue from it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Government has been doing it since God made Adam, and I think it will continue to do so. I think it would be a disaster for the Government to permit it to run free. I am quite willing that they should tax beer, and I am willing that they should tax whisky. As I said, since Adam's time this has gone on, and in all reason it will go on forever.

I say much of the abuse of alcohol stimulants can be gotten rid of by making it easier for mankind to get bread and butter and seek less solace in intoxicants. I believe it was Miss Frances E. Willard, the great apostle and angel of temperance, who said:

> Let us make it easier for mankind to get bread and butter and then freer and easier will be our burden in staying the abuse of alcoholic stimulants.

I believe we have done at least our part as far as we can in lightening the burdens of the people. I am not entirely satisfied, but at least we have gone a step in that direction. When I heard the Senator from Massachusetts this morning holding up the unfortunate picture that everything had come from our legislation, without even charging up anything to the unfortunate conditions of strife abroad and other general social conditions that have been going on the world over for years and culminated in this war, I felt that with all his big generosity usually in this particular instance he was ungenerous.

Mr. SIMMONS. Question!

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Let us know what is the question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to have a vote, if we can, on this section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to section 2 as reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to strike out all of section 2 in the bill as passed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the next amendment relating to wine, which is stricken out, and the matter proposed to be inserted by the committee be passed over with it.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to pass over the proposition on page 3 to strike out section 2, beginning in line 6 and ending in line 24, in the House bill. The committee propose to insert in lieu thereof a new section on page 4, to be known as section 3.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that that be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to strike out section 3 of the House print, on page 5, beginning in line 18 and ending in line 25.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let all that be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Section 2 of the House print is stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to pass that over. I ask that section 3 of the Senate print be passed over also.

The SECRETARY. The committee propose to insert as section 3 of the bill, beginning at the top of page 4——

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not wish any action at all upon those two pages. I want to have section 3 of the House bill stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment striking out section 3, page 5, lines 18 to 25, inclusive, gasoline, motor spirits, and so forth.

The SECRETARY. On page 5 it is proposed to strike out from line 18 to line 25, inclusive, being section 3 of the bill as passed by the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Special taxes," in section 4, on page 6, line 2, after the word "that," to strike out "from and after November 1, 1914," so as to read:

> SEC. 4. That special taxes shall be, and hereby are, imposed annually as follows, that is to say:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 5, after the word "pay," to strike out "$2" and insert "$1," and in line 18, before the words "savings bank," to insert "postal savings bank, and," so as to make the clause read:

First. Bankers shall pay $1 for each $1,000 of capital used or employed, and in estimating capital, surplus, and undivided profits shall be included. The amount of such annual tax shall in all cases be computed on the basis of the capital, surplus, and undivided profits for the preceding fiscal year. Every person, firm, or company, and every incorporated or other bank, having a place of business where credits are opened by the deposit or collection of money or currency, subject to be paid or remitted upon draft, check, or order, or where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes, or where stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes are received for discount or sale, shall be a banker under this act: Provided, That any postal savings bank and savings bank having no capital stock and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning or investing the same for the benefit of its depositors, and which does no other business of banking, shall not be subject to this tax.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] for a moment. On page 6, line 18, in the committee amendment, I think we have made an error. The language there ought to read:

That any postal savings bank or savings bank having no capital stock.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator from Mississippi is correct; and on behalf of the committee I ask to strike out the word "and," after the word "bank," in line 18, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "or" in the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, as proposed to be modified by the Senator from North Carolina on behalf of the committee, the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears none.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 6, after line 22, to strike out—

Second. Brokers shall pay $50. Every person, firm, or company whose business it is to negotiate purchases or sales of stocks, bonds, exchange, bullion, coined money, bank notes, promissory notes, or other securities, for themselves or others, shall be regarded as a broker: Provided, That any person having paid the special tax as a banker shall not be required to pay the special tax as a broker.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 5, after the word "pay," to strike out "$20" and insert "$50," so as to make the clause read:

Third. Pawnbrokers shall pay $50. Every person, firm, or company whose business or occupation it is to take or receive, by way of pledge, pawn, or exchange, any goods, wares, or merchandise, or any kind of personal property whatever, as security for the repayment of money loaned thereon, shall be deemed a pawnbroker.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, the last clause read being as follows:

Fourth. Commercial brokers shall pay $20. Every person, firm, or company whose business it is as a broker to negotiate sales or purchases of goods, wares, produce, or merchandise, or to negotiate freights and other business for the owners of vessels, or for the shippers or consignors or consignees of freight carried by vessels, shall be regarded as a commercial broker under this act.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that clause "Fourth," on page 7, under the headline "Special taxes," be passed over for the present.

Mr. SIMMONS. To what does that relate?

Mr. SMOOT. To commercial brokers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary is reading the House text, and an amendment is not now in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the bill merely being read, or is it being read for committee amendments?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is being read for committee amendments only.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I have no objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 19, to insert:

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that amendment be passed over.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have before the Committee on Finance a proposition to carry to a further extent the graduation of these particular taxes, and I suggest to the chairman the propriety of laying the bill aside at this time in order that I may have an opportunity to lay my proposition before the committee this evening.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator desires it, we will let these items go over and continue the consideration of the bill. I do not wish to delay the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Very well, then; those items may be passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. All the items on page 11 and the amendment on page 12 relating to the matter?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Do the two amendments which have been agreed to on page 11 in any way interfere with the desire of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The amendments down to and including line 13 will not interfere in any way with my proposition for a graduated tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. How about the amendment beginning in line 14?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There will be a change in line 14. My proposition is to let the tax remain at $96 on the manufacturers whose sales exceed $400,000, but do not exceed $800,000. I should therefore like, if the chairman please, to have everything approved down to and including line 13.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well; let the amendments stand adopted down to line 13; and the remainder of the amendments in the tobacco schedule may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first two amendments on page 11 have been agreed to; and the balance of the section goes over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, under the subhead "Adhesive stamps," in section 6, page 12, line 13, after the word "That," to strike out "on and after the 1st day of November, 1914," so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 2, to insert:

And the proprietor furnishing such dies or designs shall be required to purchase stamps printed therefrom in quantities of not less than $2,000 face value at any one time. That in all cases where such stamp is used, instead of cancellation by initials and date, the said stamp shall be so affixed on the box, bottle, or package that in opening the same, or using the contents thereof, the said stamp shall be effectually destroyed; and in default thereof the party making default shall be liable to the same penalty imposed for neglect to affix said stamp as hereinbefore prescribed in this act. Any person who shall fraudulently obtain or use any of the aforesaid stamps or designs therefor, and any person forging or counterfeiting, or causing or procuring the forging or counterfeiting, any representation, likeness, similitude, or colorable imitation of the said last-mentioned stamp, or any engraver or printer who shall sell or give away said stamps, or selling the same, or, being a merchant, broker, peddler, or person dealing, in whole or in part, in similar goods, wares, merchandise, manufactures, preparations, or articles, or those designed for similar objects or purposes, shall have knowingly or fraudulently in his, her, or their possession any such forged, counterfeited likeness, similitude, or colorable imitation of the said last-mentioned stamp, shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the amendment on page 19 of the bill is disagreed to, this amendment would not be necessary, and therefore I ask that it go over. It refers to the same matter as the amendment passed over on page 13, namely, proprietary medicines.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

And it shall be the duty of such collectors to supply their deputies with, or sell to other parties within their respective districts who may make application therefor, adhesive stamps, upon the same terms allowed by law or under the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who is hereby authorized to make such other regulations, not inconsistent herewith, for the security of the United States and the better accommodation of the public, in relation to the matters hereinbefore mentioned, as he may judge necessary and expedient. The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 38, after line 4, to strike out:

Insurance (life): Policy of insurance, or other instrument, by whatever name the same shall be called, whereby any insurance shall hereafter be made upon any life or lives, for each $100 or fractional part thereof, 8 cents on the amount insured: Provided, That on all policies for life insurance only issued on the industrial or weekly-payment plan of insurance the tax shall be 40 per cent of the amount of the first weekly premium. Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the amendment be passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. The one with reference to marine insurance?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. There is one provision in that amendment to which I desire to call attention.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the committee's amendment proposing to strike out the language beginning in line 5, on page 38, including all the balance on that page, and going down to the end of line 2, on page 39, was adopted, was it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, line 1——

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that all of that amendment, down to line 19, may go over.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion for the consideration of the committee, some of the Ohio insurance people were here to-day, and they suggested, in view of the fact that the committee has seen fit to exempt life insurance, marine insurance, and so forth——

Mr. LEWIS. That is the very thing it is going over for.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill does not exempt marine insurance. It exempts life insurance.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, in view of the fact that it exempts life insurance, that it should also exempt accident and health insurance.

Mr. SIMMONS. Our exemption does.

I ask that the paragraph with reference to "Insurance, casualty, fidelity, and guaranty," on page 40, running down to line 19, may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted at this time to give a notice, I desire to say that if it will suit the arrangements of the chairman of the committee I should like to address the Senate briefly upon the pending bill to-morrow morning, upon the reassembling of the Senate at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that there was an agreement this evening that immediately upon the convening of the Senate to-morrow we would take up the conference report on the Alaskan coal bill. I suppose, though, the author of that bill would have no objection to the Senator going on and finishing his speech before the conference report be taken up.

Mr. PENROSE. I will leave the notice, then, to be printed on the calendar, and I will see the Senator having the bill in charge.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, would the Senator from Pennsylvania care to begin his remarks this evening?

Mr. PENROSE. No; I am not prepared to do so now. I have just returned to Washington. I should like to have a very short time to-morrow morning.

Mr. MYERS. I will ask the Senator about how long his remarks will take.

Mr. PENROSE. I certainly do not think they will take more than half an hour; perhaps only 20 minutes.

Mr. MYERS. I shall not object to that. I am very anxious to have the conference report disposed of, but I shall not object to that.

Mr. PENROSE. I will explain to the Senator that I have to leave town in the afternoon to keep an engagement in Pennsylvania; otherwise I should not ask to address the Senate at that particular time.

Mr. MYERS. I shall not oppose it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 40, after line 19, to strike out:

Mortgage or pledge of lands, estate, or property, real or personal, heritable or movable, whatsoever, where the same shall be made as a security for the payment of any definite and certain sum of money lent at the time or previously due and owing or forborne to be paid, being payable; also any conveyance of any lands, estate, or property, whatsoever in trust to be sold or otherwise converted into money which shall be intended only as security, either by express stipulation or otherwise; on any of the foregoing exceeding $1,000 and not exceeding $1,500, 25 cents; and on each $500 or fractional part thereof in excess of $1,500, 25 cents: Provided, That upon each and every assignment or transfer of a mortgage or policy of insurance, or the renewal or continuance of any agreement or contract, a stamp duty shall be required and paid at the same rate as that imposed on the original instrument.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 41, line 11, after the words "passage ticket"——

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that amendment may be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment, including the proviso, will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 12, after the words "sleeping car," to strike out "2 cents" and insert "1 cent," so as to make the clause read:

Every seat sold in a palace or parlor car and every berth sold in a sleeping car, 1 cent, to be paid by the company selling the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 42, after line 13, it is proposed to insert "Schedule B."

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that may be passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suppose the Senator from Utah would like to have that go over.

The SECRETARY. All down to and including line 19, on page 46, is passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 20, to change the number of the section from "19" to "24"; in line 23, after the words "this act," to insert "and every person, firm, company, corporation, or association liable to any tax imposed by this act, or for the collection thereof, shall keep such records and render, under oath, such statements and returns, and shall comply with such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may from time to time prescribe, and every such person, firm, company, corporation, or association who evades or attempts to evade any of the taxes imposed by this act, or shall fail to truly account for and pay all taxes collected by them under this act, or any regulations issued thereunder, shall be subject to a penalty of double the amount of the taxes evaded or attempted to be evaded or unlawfully withheld, to be assessed and collected as other penalties incurred under internal-revenue laws are assessed and collected"; and on page 47, line 15, after the word "appropriated," to strike out "$130,000, or so much thereof as may be required, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; $100,000 to be added to and made a part of the appropriations for 'salaries and expenses of collection of internal revenues, 1915; and $30,000 to the appropriation for paper for internal-revenue stamps, 1915,'" and insert "$492,000, or so much thereof as may be required, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available; $412,000 to be added to and made a part of the appropriation 'Salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue, 1915'; $30,000 to the appropriation 'Paper for internal-revenue stamps, 1915'; $40,000 to be available to pay for personal services in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be designated as additional to the appropriation 'Salaries, office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 1915'; and $10,000 to the appropriation 'Contingent expenses, Treasury Department, stationery, 1915': Provided, That the appropriation, 'Salaries and expenses of agents and subordinate officers of internal revenue, 1915,' be, and hereby is, made available to pay the salaries of stamp agents and counters, whose employment may be necessary on account of the imprinting of stamps, the same to be reimbursed by the stamp contractors and added to the appropriation from which originally paid," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 24. That all administrative, special, or stamp provisions of law, including the law relating to the assessment of taxes, so far as applicable, are hereby extended to and made a part of this act, and every person, firm, company, corporation, or association liable to any tax imposed by this act, or for the collection thereof, shall keep such records and render, under oath, such statements and returns, and shall comply with such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may from time to time prescribe; and every such person, firm, company, corporation, or association who evades or attempts to evade any of the taxes imposed by this act, or shall fail to truly account for and pay all taxes collected by them under this act, or any regulations issued thereunder, shall be subject to a penalty of double the amount of the taxes evaded or attempted to be evaded or unlawfully withheld, to be assessed and collected as other penalties incurred under internal-revenue laws are assessed and collected; and for the expense connected with the assessment and collection of the taxes provided by this act there is hereby appropriated $492,000, or so much thereof as may be required, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available; $412,000 to be added to and made a part of the appropriation "Salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue, 1915"; $30,000 to the appropriation "Paper for internal-revenue stamps, 1915"; $40,000 to be available to pay for personal services in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be designated as additional to the appropriation "Salaries, office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 1915"; and $10,000 to the appropriation "Contingent expenses, Treasury Department, stationery, 1915": Provided, That the appropriation, "Salaries and expenses of agents and subordinate officers of internal revenue, 1915," be, and hereby is, made available to pay the salaries of stamp agents and counters, whose employment may be necessary on account of the imprinting of stamps, the same to be reimbursed by the stamp contractors and added to the appropriation from which originally paid.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge, as these are all estimates, whether it would not be a good idea to follow the rule of the Appropriations Committee and insert after each one of them "or so much thereof as may be necessary"?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that. I think that is in the bill after the lump sum.

Mr. SMOOT. I speak of the direct appropriations.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does so read now.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is, as to the lump sum.

Mr. SMOOT. It does as to the lump sum, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, after "$412,000" on page 47, line 24, "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 48, line 1, after "$30,000," it is proposed to insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, page 48, after "$40,000," it is proposed to insert the same words.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 7, page 48, after "$10,000," it is proposed to insert the same words.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 17, to change the number of the section from "20" to "25"; in line 18, after the word "effect." to strike out "on the day next succeeding the date of its passage" and insert "30 days after its approval," and in line 22, after the word "under," to strike out "Schedule A," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 25. That the provisions of this act shall take effect 30 days after its approval, except where otherwise expressly provided: Provided, That on the day after the 31st day of December, 1915, the taxes levied under this act shall no longer be levied and collected, but all taxes arising or accruing before said date shall continue to be collectible under the terms of this act. All stamps provided for in this act unused after the aforesaid date shall be redeemed from the holder thereof, under such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection I desire to ask the Senator if he thinks it is possible for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to get out all the stamps necessary within 30 days after the passage of the act. I know the enormousness of the work, and I wondered whether it could be possibly accomplished.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is right about that. My advice is that the department expected this bill to pass and has been printing the stamps for some time.

Mr. SMOOT. The engraving of them is already under way, then?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I was quite positive that it could not be done in 30 days if it were not under way.

Mr. SIMMONS. It could not; and it has been under way in anticipation of the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. With the exception of the paragraphs passed over, that completes the reading of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to give notice that I shall ask for an evening session to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. I sincerely hope it will be granted.

CALIFORNIA MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 188) ceding to the State of California temporary jurisdiction over certain lands in the Presidio of San Francisco and Fort Mason (Cal.) Military Reservations.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the joint resolution ought to be passed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. At present there is a divided jurisdiction between the United States and the State of California in the fairgrounds, and for criminal prosecution it is an embarrassment. This joint resolution, which has been approved by and, in fact, is requested by the War Department, cedes temporarily, during the exposition, to the State of California criminal jurisdiction over these grounds.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Temporarily?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Temporarily.

I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Whereas the Secretary of War was authorized by H. J. Res. 8, of February 16, 1912, to grant to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co. permission to occupy and utilize such portions of the Presidio of San Francisco and Fort Mason Military Reservations for exposition purposes as he might designate; and

Whereas the Secretary of War, under the authority in him vested by the said joint resolution, did by an instrument dated April 22, 1912, grant permission to the said company to occupy and utilize for the said purposes certain portions of the said military reservations, and did by an instrument dated April 10, 1914, grant a like permission to the said company as to certain other portions of the said Presidio Military Reservation; and

Whereas the United States now has exclusive jurisdiction over the said military reservations; and

Whereas it is desirable that the power to preserve order in all of the said portions of said reservations during their occupancy by the said Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co. be vested in the authorities of the State of California: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the United States hereby cedes to the State of California such jurisdiction over the said portions of the said military reservations as the said State now possesses elsewhere within its territory, such cession to be coextensive territorially with the said permits of April 22, 1912, and April 10, 1914, and to terminate upon their expiration: Provided, That jurisdiction to try and punish all crimes committed within said portions of said military reservations prior to the date that this cession becomes effective is reserved to the United States: Provided further, That the cession of jurisdiction made by this resolution shall not take effect until the same is accepted by the legislature of the State of California: And provided further, That when the United States shall resume possession of the said lands or any part thereof, the jurisdiction herein ceded over lands so repossessed shall revest in the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

TUESDAY, October 13, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Spirit, God over all, our Creator and our Father, in whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning, so move, we pray Thee, upon the hearts of Thy children that they may subject their wills to Thine, that pure and undefiled religion may reign supreme in every heart, in every home, in every land throughout the earth; and unto Thee, the God of love, be glory and praise forever. In the name and spirit of the Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Journal be approved.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, Senate bill 6398 has been referred to the Union Calendar. I think it should be on the House Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that that change of reference be made.

The SPEAKER. Does it call for an appropriation?

Mr. BULKLEY. No; it is to amend the Aldrich-Vreeland Act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does it put any burden on the Treasury?

Mr. BULKLEY. No; it provides for a greater amount of commercial paper to be available as security for emergency currency.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not that put a tax on the Treasury?

Mr. BULKLEY. No; the expenses are all paid by the banks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will investigate it. The Chair does not wish to have it changed now without investigation, for it might have to put it back again.

NORMAN E. IVES.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 535 (H. Rept. 1188).

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $1,200 to Norman E. Ives, for extra and expert services rendered to the Committee on Invalid Pensions during the first and second sessions of the Sixty-third Congress, as assistant clerk to said committee, by detail from the Bureau of Pensions, pursuant to law.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, this is about the usual amount that has been paid to this expert detailed from the Pension Bureau. There never has been any fixed amount for the services.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has it been the uniform practice for Congress to vote an allowance to this clerk assigned to the Invalid Pensions Committee from the Pension Department?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; it has for a number of years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform us how much the maximum amount is that has been paid?

Mr. LLOYD. In the Sixty-second Congress he was paid $2,400 for the entire Congress. In the Sixty-first Congress he was paid $2,400.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is for the Congress or the session?

Mr. LLOYD. For the first and second sessions.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

WILLIAM M'KINLEY COBB.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 483 (H. Rept. 1189).

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $1,200 to William McKinley Cobb, for extra and expert services rendered to the Committee on Pensions during the first and second sessions of the Sixty-third Congress as assistant clerk to said committee by detail from the Bureau of Pensions, pursuant to law.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, this is a similar authorization and a similar amount to the man detailed from the Pension Bureau to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that the same rule has been applied to the Committee on Pensions as applied to the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; except that the expert detailed to the Committee on Pensions has not received quite so much as the one detailed to the Invalid Pension Committee. This places them on the same basis. As far as the work performed during the last two sessions is concerned, they have apparently done the same service and are entitled to the same pay. Their services have been very valuable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What has been the maximum amount paid the expert to the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. LLOYD. In the Sixty-second Congress he was paid $1,750. In the Sixty-first Congress he was paid $1,750.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I served on the Committee on Pensions, and I have personal knowledge that Mr. Cobb has worked nearly every day and Sundays writing up the records; and I am sure that the members of the Committee on Pensions, irrespective of party, will say that he has earned this amount for faithful and efficient service. The committee has acted on a great many more bills than any other Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can see that with the work of the Committee on Invalid Pensions becoming less by reason of the passage of the service-pension law and the work of the Committee on Pensions becoming more by reason of the increase of age of Spanish-American War veterans that they should be put on a parity.

Mr. CRISP. He has had to write up every case before the committee acted upon it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am very glad to have the testimony of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that this is an increase of salary?

Mr. LLOYD. No.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

JENNIE MERCER.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 582 (H. Rept. 1187).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Jennie Mercer, widow of Philip Mercer, late messenger to the Committee on Pensions of the House, an amount equal to six months of his compensation as such messenger, and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray the funeral expenses of said Philip Mercer.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 12161. An act to remove the charge of desertion against John Mitchell; and

H. R. 13296. An act for the enlargement, etc., of the Wall Street front of the assay office in the city of New York.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the forest-reserve policy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the conservation policy. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, at the same time I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks upon the question of woman suffrage, and that I may print in the RECORD a telegram from Dr. Anna Howard Shaw.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I object to the telegram part of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, one request a day is considerable for any Member to make. I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's first request to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of conservation? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman to extend his remarks upon the subject of woman suffrage?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman should prefer that request to-morrow or some other day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

WILLIAM C. ADAMS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up House joint resolution 362, discharge the Committee on Indian Affairs from further consideration of the same, and consider it at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to take up House joint resolution 362, discharge the Committee on Indian Affairs from further consideration of it, and consider it at this time. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to correct an error in the enrollment of certain Indians enumerated in Senate Document No. 478, Sixty-third Congress, second session, enacted into law in the Indian appropriation act approved August 1, 1914.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to substitute the name of William C. Adams in place of Mitchell C. Adams, jr., in the list of Mississippi Choctaw Indians enumerated in Senate Document No. 478, Sixty-third Congress, second session, which Indians so enumerated in said document were authorized to be enrolled on the respective rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes by section 17, paragraph 9, of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses for the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915," approved August 1, 1914.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand this is merely to correct a typographical error in the spelling of the name of a person who was to receive allotment of Indian lands.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is true. The name should have been William, and it is Mitchell.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER. Under the special rule the House will resolve itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18459, the Philippine bill, with Mr. ADAIR in the chair.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I understand that section 21 is still open to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. My purpose is to direct the attention of the chairman of the committee to an apparent hiatus that was created in the preceding section in the amendment that was adopted to it in providing that the term of the first Commissioner shall expire on March 4, 1921. If the gentleman will follow the mathematical feature of it, he will find that under the phraseology in the present paragraph it provides that the successor is to take his office from the 4th of March following the election, that phraseology being found in lines 6 and 7, on page 17. The election will be held in June, 1921. It is provided here that the term of the Commissioner is to expire on March 4, 1921. There will be no Resident Commissioner from March 4, 1921, until March 4, 1922, when the successor takes his office. There is a hiatus that must be corrected, otherwise there will be no Commissioner representing the Philippine Islands here at Washington.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman has called my attention to that. This was a consequential amendment, which was adopted rather hastily, and it may be open to the objection suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin. Therefore I am going to ask unanimous consent that we may return to this section later for the purpose of perfecting the language to which the gentleman from Wisconsin has called attention.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is entirely satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that this section may be returned to later for the purpose of perfecting the language referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Virginia, and therefore I want to direct his attention to section 18, page 13, to a verbal change, which looks to me important. Beginning in line 20, after the word "proceedings," we find the following language:

Both houses shall convene at the capital on the 16th day of October following the next election—

And so forth.

Ought not the words "the next" be stricken out? If they are to convene on the 16th of October following the next election, that would indicate the election next after they were to convene, which, of course, would be entirely improper. If the word "next" is to be retained, should it not read—

On the 16th day of October next following the election?

Has not that been transposed there in such a way as to spoil the meaning of it?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I have not had an opportunity to examine this question, and I am going to make the same request in respect to this section that I made as to the other, so that we may take them up and consider the two matters together.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the request, but before the gentleman does that this thought occurs to me: A subsequent section provides that the Philippine Legislature may itself fix the date of its meeting after this first meeting, and the thought is that this would simply provide for the first meeting of the legislature, and that then thereafter they would take care of it themselves.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman will observe this paragraph is not devoted at all to the first session of the legislature, but is a general paragraph prescribing generally when the legislature is going to meet after the general election. The paragraph which is concerned with the first legislature is section 16.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia state his request again?

Mr. JONES. My request, Mr. Chairman, was that I ask unanimous consent to return to section 18 for the purpose of perfecting certain language in that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to return to section 18 for the purpose of perfecting certain language in the section. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, that request, I believe, passes this section over for further consideration as to that particular matter?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; as to that particular matter.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment. I move to strike out from line 23, page 17, all after the word "appoint," and on line 24, running down and including the word "senate." In other words, I move to strike out the words "by and with the consent of the Philippine Senate."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 17, lines 23 and 24, by striking out the words "by and with the consent of the Philippine Senate."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, this section refers to the powers of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands. It provides that all appointments that he shall make must be confirmed by the Philippine Senate. In my judgment that is an exceedingly unwise requirement. The number of officers will be large that the Governor General will be required to appoint. They will be exceedingly diversified in character, from those of the greatest importance, analogous to our Cabinet appointments, down to the lowest type of officers who may represent the central government in the Philippines. If it shall be required that every one of those officers shall be approved by the senate who are appointed by the Governor General, it will make large batches of them sent to the senate for approval and confirmation. Consideration will be impossible, and it will be impossible, I will say to the committee, that those appointments can be made when they are needed. Unless you provide that there shall be a continuous session of the senate those appointments can not made Of course, it is desired that there shall not be long and continuous sessions of the legislature. It is not desired that the legislature shall be continuously in session as the Congress of the United States is almost continuously in session, and to make these appointments dependent upon the confirmation of the senate is, in my judgment, seriously to impede the effective operation of governmental affairs in the Philippines.

Not only is that true, Mr. Chairman, but I desire to suggest to the committee this further reason why I think these appointments ought not to be made: The division, that we all approve, of governmental power into the executive and into the legislative departments comes much closer to the people in the States and in the Territories than in the National Government. While of course the appointments of the President are, many of them, subject to confirmation of the Senate, we will find that in the States and, I think very rarely, in the Territories is the executive power to appoint limited by the necessity of confirmation by the senate. It is a proposition that we all ought carefully to consider by which we make the exercise of legislative power dependent upon executive approval—nay, I will not say dependent upon executive approval, but really controlled by executive power.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. In just a moment; if the gentleman will pardon me, I want to finish this. Neither is it a good thing to make the exercise of executive power, administrative purely in its features, dependent upon the approval of the legislative department of the Government, and I submit that just as soon as you enter upon a course of that kind, and especially in a country like the Philippines, you submit at once an issue of the most serious character between the executive and the legislative departments of the Government. You raise questions where the legislative authority says to the executive administrative authority, "Come to our conception of what laws ought to be passed or we will not confirm the appointment which you make."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNER. You say to the executive power of the government, "You can make no appointments that do not suit us," and you at once curb him; you force upon him consideration not of fitness primarily, but whether or not a person whom he desires to appoint will or will not be acceptable to the legislative department of the government. And so, in my judgment, it is unwise to put this extremely delicate and embarrassing situation and condition in the body of this very fundamental charter of government. Now I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York if he desires to submit a question.

Mr. GOULDEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I wanted to ask him whether he did not think the language on page 18 would cover the matter of appointments while the legislature was not in session, namely, "but appointments made while the senate is not in session shall be effective either until disapproval or until the next adjournment of the senate," just the same as we do here and as is done in all the States. I understand the gentleman's objection to lie on the ground of the length of time the Senate of the Philippine Islands shall be in session, and that the interim would prevent proper appointments being confirmed. As amended this bill, if enacted into law, does not limit the sessions of the legislature in the Philippines.

Mr. TOWNER. No; I will say to the gentleman that is not all of the objection. My objection goes much deeper than that.

Mr. GOULDEN. That is one of the objections?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; that is one of the objections; but let me say to the gentleman it is true that ad interim appointments, which are only perhaps for a year or more, will go to the senate in great batches for the consideration of the senate.

Mr. GOULDEN. Just as they do here.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, I think there are not very many of them, comparatively.

Mr. GOULDEN. Quite a number, I should judge.

Mr. TOWNER. I think it will be impossible to secure from the senate such consideration of the merits of these appointments as I think they ought to have; and I will say further that I think the gentleman is quite right, and if my amendment shall be adopted subsequent language in the section would have to be changed. I would be very glad indeed to have the privilege of offering to change the subsequent language if my amendment is adopted.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I am earnestly opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

In my general discussion of the pending bill I have already touched upon the question he raises, so that I need now merely call the attention of the committee to two new points.

It seems to me, first of all, that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is not in accord with the theory upon which this bill is framed. The bill is supposedly enacted for the purpose of giving the people of the Philippine Islands a sufficient opportunity to demonstrate their capacity for self-government to such an extent as is possible without placing the international relations of the United States in jeopardy. Much as the two sides of this House may disagree with regard to Philippine independence, in principle there has not been much difference on that score in so far as I have been able to perceive from the remarks that have been made during the debate. Such being the case, the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa ought to be voted down, because it is subversive of the very purpose of the bill. By granting the people of the Philippines legislative powers alone you fail to give them all the opportunities whereby their political capacity might be tested. To legislate is doubtless an important, perhaps the most important, function of a government, but the administration of law is also an essential part of the governmental process. Unless the Filipino people be permitted to show what they can do in the administration of their laws, such evidence as they may furnish through their legislative acts regarding their capacity for self-government will be challenged as insufficient. By requiring that the appointments of the Governor General be confirmed by the senate you give the Filipino people an opportunity to show their judgment regarding the proper administration of their laws.

It would be an inconsistent position to give the Filipino people the power to legislate for themselves, thereby assuming that they will legislate for their own interests and in that of their government, while on the other hand denying them the right to confirm executive appointments on the assumption, as suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, that they will use that power for selfish or partisan purposes rather than with a view to the exigencies of the public service. If elected senators can not be trusted with the power of confirming appointments made by the Governor General—if they be expected to use that power unpatriotically—an elected Filipino legislature should not be established at all. Legislative powers are greater, more far-reaching, than the power to confirm appointments, and the injury to the community in case of abuse of legislative power is by far greater than the evils arising from an unwise exercise of the power of confirming appointments. If the Philippine Senate be not permitted to say who may not occupy the positions created by the Philippine Legislature, the latter body should have neither the power to create these positions nor to abolish them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from the Philippines may be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from the Philippines may be allowed to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUEZON. I wish to thank the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, the worst feature of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa is that it will assuredly prevent the harmonious development of the government which you are planning to establish in the Philippine Islands. The Filipinos do not differ from other people. They are the same flesh and bone and spirit, and they will act exactly as other people would act under the same circumstances and for the same reason. The history of the world teaches us that whenever governmental powers are not voluntarily granted to a people, and whenever such power can be obtained through some other means the people will not fail to take it. If you deny the Filipino people the power to say who may not hold office under the Philippine Government, if they can find some other means under this act whereby they will be able, indirectly at least, to make their voice effective on the matter now at issue they will do so. They may seek to do either of these two things: They may try either to influence the Governor General to appoint officials whose appointment they desire, or, if the Governor General refuse to accede to their wish, they may antagonize and obstruct his administration, openly defying the Governor General by abolishing such positions as are occupied by officials objectionable to them through the withholding of appropriations. Thus you create at once a cause of trouble between the Governor General and the legislature, a condition which would not exist were the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa to be defeated. I do not care to deny that Filipino senators might at times refuse to confirm an appointment. Such a thing has happened in this country, and if report be credited such an instance has recently occurred even here. The result there, however, would ordinarily be just what it has been here—the senate would confirm the appointments of the Governor General, as a matter of course, and the readiness of the senate to confirm these appointments would depend, as it does here, upon the wisdom of the appointments and the personal influence of the Governor General. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I have naturally talked with as many people familiar with the Philippine Islands, the government and the people there, and the probable effect of this bill as I could conveniently reach, as, of course, other members of the committee have done. I have yet to find a single man among all those with whom I have talked—and some of them have been hopeful that good would result from this bill—I have not found a single man who did not say that the provision contained in this bill would be absolutely fatal.

The gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON] has made a most interesting and valuable talk. I have enjoyed every word that he has said. But, Mr. Chairman, if you will apply his remarks in favor of the amendment, you will find that they have ten times the weight and effect that they have when applied in opposition thereto.

Now, let us just disabuse our minds of one thing, necessary and somewhat difficult for us to do; it is that we should not decide this question by reason of considerations here at home. We have an entirely different situation in the United States.

The President of the United States submits his executive appointments to the confirmation of the United States Senate. But the power back of both the Executive and the Senate is the same. It comes from one people; it comes from one body—the citizenship of the United States. In the Philippines under this bill—and it is the bill we have before us upon which we are to decide—there are two political entities, each deriving its power from a different source. There is the power of the Filipino people, and it is the purpose of this bill to a considerable extent, and certainly the purpose of the Members on this side of the aisle to a large extent, to give to the people of the Philippine Islands the fullest possible opportunity to govern themselves, reserving only the check and the balance which every intelligent mind must know should exist and which the Filipinos themselves know must exist. We have reserved the check only in one way. We have reserved it in the Executive. The power of the Executive and the authority for his action comes not from the people of the Philippine Islands, but from the people of the United States, and if you, by the terms of this act, paralyze his hands, you have stricken down the safeguard that you recognize must be there, because you attempted to put it in the bill.

Now, it seems to me only reasonable for us to consider whether, if the appointees of the Governor General must be confirmed by the Philippine Senate, his hands will be paralyzed. We are not to consider this amendment in the light of conditions that may exist 10 or 20 or 50 years from now, but we should consider it in the light of conditions that are in the islands to-day. The importance of this amendment will be much lessened as the years go by, until I can see that a time shall come when very likely the amendment may not be necessary. I can conceive of a condition as being reached—and I think it will be reached—when the Filipino Senate might be intrusted with the power of confirming the big majority of the appointments of the Governor General. But to give the Filipino Senate to-day the authority to say that no man appointed by the executive to do the executive work in the islands shall exercise the functions of his office without their approval, by that act you paralyze the executive. There is no other language so adequately describing it.

Now let us just consider it a little bit. There are not a myriad of appointments which the Governor General will have to make, and at first I want that fact distinctly understood. Has my time expired, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. MILLER. I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. The great majority of the employees in the Philippine Islands are under civil service, and I think it can be safely said that the civil service in the islands has been developed and perfected to a point where it is even superior to that in the United States. There will be no confirmation needed in respect to all civil-service employees. Confirmations will be required only respecting the heads of departments and their assistants, practically.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. About how many appointments of the Governor General will be affected by this amendment, should it be adopted?

Mr. MILLER. I am sorry I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. GOULDEN. Would it be a score of prominent officials?

Mr. MILLER. Oh, yes; I suppose there would be two or three score.

Mr. GOULDEN. One more question. Has not this measure as it appears in this section received the approval of the present Governor General, in whom we all have implicit confidence and who is highly respected by the people of this country generally?

Mr. MILLER. I do not know whether it has or not; but I will say to the gentleman that that would not enhance its value in my eyes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In reference to the number of appointments, it would include all those now made by the commission and also those contained in the act and also those who may hereafter be authorized by law to be appointed. It is an unlimited number—entirely indeterminate.

Mr. MILLER. That is true. There would be a considerable number, but not a myriad, not a great crowd of them, but men absolutely essential to the conduct of the administration of the law in the islands.

Now, suppose the Governor General nominates a man for secretary of the interior, or for attorney general, or for director of public instruction, or director of prisons, or director of police, or director of health and sanitation, or any of these purely executive offices that are so essential to the conduct of the government in the islands, and confirmation is refused. You give here the greatest opportunity in the world for a conflict between the two powers you have in the islands. You invite it; you ask for it. In effect you tell the Filipino Senate that it must confirm these appointments. The Filipino naturally has in mind some trading. Very well, we will confirm the appointments, the Filipinos will say, provided you will permit the passage of such and such legislation. So, therefore, you either absolutely paralyze the executive or you make him subservient to the legislative branch. It is a condition entirely different from that which we have in the United States.

It seems to me that we should avoid that friction—avoid this opportunity for contention. I know the gentleman from the Philippine Islands has suggested that the amendment will lead to friction, but I submit that without the amendment friction is bound to result and with the amendment friction will be avoided.

By the terms of this act you actually hold out to the Filipino mind an inducement to demand reprisals, an inducement to make trades with the executive. So, if it be your purpose and your plan to give to the people of the islands the fullest possible autonomy, only reserving a check, you have failed unless you write this amendment in the bill. I believe sincerely that this amendment is the most important thing to the entire bill under consideration.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. Would the gentleman strike out all power of confirmation of appointments by the Governor General?

Mr. MILLER. I would for the present.

Mr. BORLAND. That is the amendment?

Mr. MILLER. That is the amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman fear that that would destroy any possible cooperation between the executive officers in the senate?

Mr. MILLER. On the contrary, it would conduce toward it. I can not conceive of the Governor General making any appointments under this act in violation of the wishes of the people of the islands. The legislative branch has always the whip handle and power. It can abolish an office; it can restrict appropriations. We have given to the people of the islands, through their legislature, almost complete and entire authority over their own affairs.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MILLER. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. That being true, suppose the Governor General should appoint some of these members of his official family who did not enjoy the confidence of the Filipino Legislature; what would be the inevitable result?

Mr. MILLER. I can conceive that there might be some man appointed by the Governor General who would not be entirely liked by the members of the senate; but he ought to have that power to appoint, and leave it to his judgment and discretion to make good appointments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I am obliged to take a contrary stand to that of the Philippine Commissioner. I do not think we ought to be swayed too much in our consideration of this question from its adoption in this country. We all know that it was the fear of the founders of our Government that the Executive might become too powerful, and to put some curb on his authority the framers required that certain Executive appointments and others, as Congress might provide, should be submitted to the Senate for confirmation. I am not certain, but I believe there will be confirmation on the other side of the Chamber as to whether there would not have been better appointments made by the President of the United States without the bartering that sometimes was entered into between our Executive and certain Members of another body than if he were free-handed to appoint those whom he saw fit to appoint.

I can recall instances where appointments have been refused confirmation where it was the unanimous opinion of the people that the first appointments were superior to the later ones, but because of petty political spite they were rejected.

What are the conditions confronting us here? The burden of the argument of the Commissioner is that this power should be vested in the senate, so that it may be held over the Governor General as a club to get officers that will be favorable to the Filipino people. That might be all right from the politician's standpoint.

Mr. QUEZON. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not misquote me. I never said that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman did not make the direct statement, but the effect of the gentleman's argument is that it would avoid friction between the senate and the Governor General. His further argument is that the senators should have some say in the appointments made by the Governor General. For what purpose should they have that say? Read the history of this country and apply it to the Philippines, and we know with only a bare knowledge of conditions in the Philippines that politics are as rife and that political parties as determined for success as they are in this country; we know that they are going to seek patronage from the Governor General.

I believe that it is better for the Philippine Government to have absolute separation between the executive and the legislative branches; that we should vest in the legislature complete authority over legislative matters and give to the Governor General a free hand so that he can not barter with the senators nor the senators barter with him as to veto power that he has to apply to legislation that will be submitted to him. Can there be imagined, as was indicated by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], that the Governor General, whom the President of the United States appoint, subject to removal by the President at any time, will appoint a man to a subordinate position that will not be in harmony with the existing sentiment of the people of the Philippine Islands or will be giving to the government an execution of the administrative branch that will not be satisfactory to the people of those islands?

Mr. QUEZON. Will the gentleman yield for an answer?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. QUEZON. It has been done.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where the administration has not been sufficient or satisfactory?

Mr. QUEZON. No; the Governor General has appointed men not satisfactory to the Filipino people.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, they might not have been satisfactory to some faction.

Mr. QUEZON. Oh, everybody.

Mr. STAFFORD. Or to some political party who wished to get the offices. We wish in inaugurating this more liberal policy to have it started so that there will be no such friction between the Governor General and the senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I feel obliged to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. Congress is to retain authority to amend this law at any time; and should there be serious trouble over there concerning appointments, Congress could take notice of it and change this requirement of confirmation by the Philippine Senate. But I agree with the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON]. By this bill we propose to give the Philippine Legislature power to make laws and, in my judgment, we ought not to give the Governor General, a man sent to the islands from this country, the absolute power, without regard to the wishes of the people there, to appoint whomsoever he may please to appoint to execute and interpret the laws. Our people would never consent that a President should have the unqualified right to make all appointments to Federal offices in this country without confirmation by the representatives of the people in the Senate of the United States. To understand the importance of this right of confirmation of appointments we need to refer only to the history of the present session of Congress.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this amendment, and I can say why in three minutes. The executive in the Philippines is the only voice the United States has there. He is appointed by the President and confirmed by our Senate, and as such represents the United States authority, and while he is there his function is to enforce the law. The law which he is called upon to enforce is to be made by the legislature over there, which is not beholden to the United States. There are two functions here that are very distinct. One is the policy-determining function and the other is the administrative function. The policy-determining function there, as here, is in the legislative department, while the administrative function there, as here, is in the executive department. The first function expresses itself in lawmaking, the second in law enforcing. In this country it is true that we require the appointments of the President to be confirmed by the Senate, but the President is beholden to the people here, just the same as the Senate and the House are beholden to the people. In this country the authority is in the same place—the people—but in that country it is partly in the people of the islands and partly in the people of the United States, and I do not believe that if we have but one voice in the islands, namely, the voice of the Governor General, that in the exercise of his function of administration of the laws we should tie his hands by the legislature, which is not responsible to the people of this country at all. Therefore it seems to me that if the Governor General, who is our spokesman, charged with the enforcement of the law, is to be the administrative officer, and as such responsible to this country, his hands should not be tied by the legislative department over there, whose function is purely determining what the laws are to be. He must be free to perform his duty unhampered by an outside authority. It seems to me that it is extremely wise that this amendment be adopted to secure this freedom of performance of duty. We certainly can not use the United States history, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has used it, in confirmation of what we do over there. The situation is entirely different. One is a government in which the people in their entirety are ruling, and the other is a government in which the people of the islands determine the legislature and the laws of the islands and this country determines the executive and the enforcement of the laws. For that reason we ought to keep the hands of the man who represents the voice of this country totally free from any interference over there. I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat, I would like to inquire whether this right of confirmation would apply to such appointees as the Governor might have around him in his immediate office, as, for instance, his private secretary.

Mr. QUEZON. Oh, no. I can answer that. That is under the civil service.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Wisconsin indicated that it would apply to those having to do with the administration of the laws.

Mr. FESS. The language of the bill is:

Such officers as may now be appointed by the Governor General, or such as he is authorized by this act to appoint.

Mr. MOORE. Suppose he wanted to appoint a private secretary or a director, with whom he must have confidential relations; would that appointment have to go to the Philippine Legislature?

Mr. BRYAN. If it is a statutory office, it would.

Mr. FESS. If it is an office created under this act, it would, or an office to be created hereafter.

Mr. MOORE. If that is so, it would put the Governor General in this peculiar position, that the appointment of even those who are immediately responsible to him for the execution of his own orders would be subject to confirmation by the senate there. What I would like to know is, whether this provision goes that far.

Mr. QUEZON. The secretary of the Governor General will not be confirmed by the senate. He is a civil-service employee.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. The gentleman will recall that the present Governor General, Mr. Harrison, took his secretary with him over there.

Mr. QUEZON. He was the executive secretary.

Mr. MILLER. He was to be his private secretary.

Mr. QUEZON. He did not appoint him as such.

Mr. MILLER. The Governor General also appoints, and would have to have the appointment confirmed by the senate, the assistant executive secretary, who is in confidential relations with the Governor General himself. The executive secretary and the assistant executive secretary have those confidential relations with the Governor General to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers, and their appointments would have to be confirmed by the senate.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The thought I have about this provision is this: If the Philippine Legislature under this section should exercise its power to the limit, it could prevent the Governor General from appointing anybody. It could estop him from taking with him a secretary or a clerk in whom he had confidence, such as it has just been indicated Gov. Gen. Harrison took with him; and if the question ever should arise between the Governor General and the Philippine Legislature as to the appointment of a confidential agent, I presume under this section the Philippine Legislature could always defeat the will of the Governor.

Mr. QUEZON. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. QUEZON. I wish to say to the gentleman that the clerks of the Governor General are appointed under the civil-service laws and they are not appointed by the Governor General.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to ask the gentleman from the Philippines if it is the idea that if a position is in the civil service it would be relieved from the requirement of confirmation by the senate?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Why does the gentleman have that idea?

Mr. QUEZON. Because the bill says so. It says that appointments made by the Governor General shall be confirmed by the senate; since civil-service employees are not appointed by the Governor General, their appointments do not have to be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. TOWNER. I still do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. QUEZON. My understanding of the law is that the appointments made by the Governor General, which, according to the present laws in the Philippines, must be confirmed by the commission, should be confirmed by the senate.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman means those who now hold the offices.

Mr. QUEZON. Those who under our present laws are appointed without confirmation by the commission will not be subject to the confirmation of the senate.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman means those now holding these positions?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. But at any time when a change is made, would not these offices be necessarily subject to this provision of the law?

Mr. QUEZON. I do not believe so.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MOORE. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman's reference is "unless otherwise herein provided," page 17, line 23.

Mr. TOWNER. Does that exempt the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. FESS. This language says:

He shall, unless otherwise herein provided, appoint, by and with the consent of the Philippine Senate, such officers as may now be appointed by the Governor General.

Mr. QUEZON. The Governor General does not appoint any officer under the civil-service law. He only appoints the judges of the court of first instance, the chiefs and assistant chiefs of bureaus, the prosecuting attorneys, justices of the peace, and treasurers.

Mr. FESS. Could not a future legislature change that?

Mr. QUEZON. I suppose it could.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me suggest that as soon as this act goes into effect every one of the appointees of the governor will have to be appointed by the governor. Now, it makes no difference whether they are in or out of the civil service, they will have, under the terms of this bill, to be confirmed by the senate. This is merely an additional requirement in certain cases that they shall be within the civil service to qualify, but that does not take——

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I observe my time is flying, although it has been very profitably employed. I simply wish to add that this section does suggest the possibility of a cabal in the senate which would bring about a deadlock at any time in the appointment of these officers. The law could be amended as indicated by the gentleman from Wisconsin even if we admit this amendment. Any time questions arise as between the governor and the Philippine Legislature and it should appear that we had erred in this instance, Congress could very readily pass an act that would cover it. The section, as it now stands, points to the government being brought to a deadlock whenever there is a difference between the governor and the senate.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE. I do.

Mr. MILLER. Does not the gentleman think the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin is very greatly lessened in value by reason of the fact that when we once confer upon a people or organization power that it is one of the hardest things on earth, no matter how much it may have been abused, to take away that power.

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman is confusing the gentlemen from Wisconsin to whom I referred. I referred to the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. COOPER.

Mr. MILLER. So did I.

Mr. MOORE. He indicated this law could be repealed at any time.

Mr. MILLER. I understand; but whenever you grant the power of confirmation to the senate in this act, no matter whether it is ill used, does not the gentleman appreciate how hard it would be to get an authorization of Congress to take away a power once granted?

Mr. MOORE. It would be undoubtedly a very difficult thing to do.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there are several minor matters to which I wish to direct attention.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, substantially every argument which has been made in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has been an indictment of our own system of government. The theory upon which this bill is drawn is to enlarge the power of the government of the Philippine people over their own domestic activities. The only restrictions that have been placed in this bill in order to safeguard it are restrictions that will protect the United States as long as it has sovereignty over the islands against legislation that might affect it in its foreign relations. If gentlemen will analyze the bill carefully, I think they will find that statement to be absolutely true. Wherever there has existed a possibility of the foreign relations of the Government of the United States being embarrassed by legislation in the Philippine Islands, full power has been retained in this bill to the Government of the United States to prevent that legislation. In some cases we have gone so far as to require affirmative action on the part of the President of the United States before certain legislation that might have such a tendency shall become a law. But as regards their local affairs, legislative and administrative, it is the purpose of the committee to try to give the fullest measure of self-government consistent with sound principles, and upon that theory this bill has been drawn, and upon that theory, assuming that if we are to give to the legislative body the power to legislate, assuming that they have the intelligence requisite to legislate concerning their own local affairs, we have assumed that they would have the intelligence requisite to consider the appointments of the officials who are to administer the laws that they make. And in consonance with that theory and in line with our own constitutional provision, we have provided in here a participation by the Senate of the Philippine Islands in the matter of appointments. I very much hope that gentlemen will understand the theory upon which the bill is drawn, and that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] will not prevail.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of directing the attention of the committee to one or two minor provisions. I notice in the middle of page 18 a provision requiring the Governor General to submit within 10 days of the opening of each regular session of the legislature a budget of receipts and expenditures. Under the practice of our Government, as the gentleman knows, the various department heads are obliged to submit by October 15 of each year their estimate of appropriations and on the opening day of the Congress the Book of Estimates has to be submitted to the Congress. But the committees have tentative drafts of that Book of Estimates beforehand so that they can begin the work of preparing the appropriation bills. I would like to inquire as to the reason for deferring for 10 days the submission of this budget to the legislature. Why should not the Governor General be able to submit it on the very first day, so that the legislature can begin work in the preparation of its appropriation bills?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman refer to that part where it says that he shall submit it within 10 days?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The thought of the committee was that he should submit——

Mr. JONES. It is within the first 10 days of the opening of the legislature.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not say at the opening of each regular session? The Governor General should be in a position to submit it, and should submit it, and not cause the legislature to wait 10 days before it can begin work on the preparation of its appropriation bills. Will the gentleman have any objection to reducing that to 5 days? Certainly a 10-day limitation seems very long.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The thought in connection with it is this, Mr. Chairman: This provides for a budget of receipts and expenditures. What we have in this country is merely an estimate, and that is not necessarily the basis by law for appropriations, but, as a matter of practice, perhaps it is in a sense a basis. Now, it is especially provided here, if this is passed, to put in the organic law that this budget shall be the basis for the annual appropriation bills. It might be very proper, I submit to the gentleman, that the Governor General should have some opportunity for consulting the members of the senate and of the house before being compelled to submit this annual budget which it is intended shall be absolutely the basis for appropriations. We hope to make some improvement there over our system in this country.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think there can be some improvement; but does not the gentleman believe that 10 days is quite a long time to hold up the legislature before it can begin work on appropriation bills?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not; especially in view of the amendment that has been adopted, which takes off the 90-day limit and provides for continuous sessions.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to my friend.

Mr. HELM. As I grasp this proposition, this budget is simply a presentation to the legislature of the receipts and the expenditures for the preceding fiscal year. It is simply to be used as a tentative basis for succeeding appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer. I wish to direct another inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MORRISON). The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire of some member of the committee as to the reason why the word "supreme" is used in the first line of the section. It says "supreme executive." What is the reason for the qualification of the word "executive" in that particular?

Mr. JONES. It means the chief executive, and I certainly think there can be no objection to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any executive power lodged in any other official by this bill?

Mr. JONES. Yes; there is. The heads of the departments have a great deal of executive power, and there are four great departments of the Government. And the idea is that the highest power, the supreme power, shall be in the Governor General, and I think "supreme" is a very proper word.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FESS. In lines 18 and 19 we have the Governor General's term of office unlimited.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. On what page?

Mr. FESS. On page 17. The provision is "He shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and hold his office at the pleasure of the President." I want to ask whether you had considered fully the idea of limiting the Governor General's term, and had decided to make it unlimited?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think it is better to make it as it is in the bill, for this reason: Administrations change in this country, and I think it is always desirable to have in the Philippines a Governor General in sympathy with the foreign policies, at least, of the administration existing in this country. It is the present law, of course, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. FESS. Yes; I know.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And I do not think that under the conditions that exist and the involvements that might occur it would be wise to fix a definite term, so that it would be possible for a Governor General of the Philippines to be out of sympathy with the administration here so long as we retain sovereignty over the islands. Then, of course, if the gentleman will pardon me further, he being familiar with English history and knowing the struggle that England has had at various times in dealing with her colonial governors, the gentleman will realize that if a definite term were fixed for the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, no matter what his sins might be, there would be no way to remove him except by impeachment, unless this power were left with the President to remove him.

Mr. FESS. What I had in mind was that our theory was short terms and quick responsibility, and I also thought probably we would want to avoid the appearance of partisan administrations, and if we had the limit fixed the very thing that the gentleman from Tennessee has said would be advisable would be avoided as an ill-advised thing, in my judgment. It seems to me that the Philippine administration ought not to respond to partisan affiliations over here.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me, I did not mean in my statement that it ought to respond to the partisan situation in regard to domestic affairs in this country——

Mr. FESS. Only on foreign matters?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But I did think that the administration here ought to have the authority given in the bill.

Mr. FESS. I am rather of the opinion that the bill as it is would be better than to fix the term. I just wanted to know if that has been fully considered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It has been fully considered, and we had that view of it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 18, line 4, by striking out the remainder of the sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the words "until disapproved by the Philippine Senate," so that it will read as follows:

That appointments made while the senate is not in session shall be effective until disapproved by the Philippine Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, after the word "effective," in line 4, strike out the remainder of the sentence and insert in lieu thereof "until disapproved by the Philippine Senate."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I submit this for the consideration of the committee, and I do not care to discuss it to any great extent.

It seems to me it would give added strength to the situation. If you are going to require that appointments be confirmed by the Senate, it seems to me that the Senate ought to act upon them one way or the other, and the thing ought not to be allowed to drag on indefinitely, as is contemplated by this provision.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The only effect would be this: That it would prevent the necessity of recommissioning if the Senate should adjourn without approval. Under the practice that prevails in the United States, if what we call a recess appointment is made, if the Senate at the succeeding session does not approve it, of course that commission ends; but the President, of course, can immediately recommission.

Mr. MILLER. That was the exact point I desired to obviate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The thought in the use of this language is that it will probably spur the Senate to take action by leaving it as it is here. I do not see that it makes any practical difference at all.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, pending the consideration by the committee of that amendment, I would like to make an inquiry respecting another part of the same paragraph, all in my time.

On page 19, in line 4, where the Governor General is given power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus and establish martial law, I find this language:

And he may, in case of rebellion or invasion, or imminent danger thereof, when the public safety requires it, suspend the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus or place the islands, or any part thereof, under martial law—

And here is the language I particularly refer to—until communication can be had with the President and his decision therein made known.

Has the President of the United States the authority to suspend the writ of habeas corpus in the Philippine Islands? Has he the authority to declare the islands under martial law? Is this to let him veto the action of the Governor General or to approve it, or is this simply that the Governor General may have a consultation with the President? I would really like to be informed as to the effect of this language.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The Constitution of the United States gives the President of the United States the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. I have not the exact language before me, and I do not know whether I can find it in a moment.

Mr. FESS. It does not say "the President." It says "the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended," and so forth. It does not say by whom.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There may be some statute passed which gives the President that power.

Mr. FESS. President Jefferson did it, and President Lincoln did it, which would be a precedent to the effect that the President can do it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The language is this:

The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when, in cases of invasion or rebellion, the public safety may require.

Mr. FESS. That is it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I presume that in those cases in which it has been exercised by Presidents of the United States it has been thought that the public safety required it, and having been acquiesced in it has been conceded that as the supreme executive officer of the Government and as Commander in Chief of the Army the President had that authority.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will ask for recognition, then, Mr. Chairman. Does the gentleman from Ohio want more time?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. QUEZON. One question only, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. One moment. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. In confirmation of what the gentleman said a moment ago I will say that President Jefferson suspended the writ of habeas corpus in the case of the arrest of Aaron Burr, in 1807. It was questioned at that time whether he had the authority under the Constitution. Many contended that this function was lodged in the Congress. Then, during the Civil War President Lincoln suspended the writ of habeas corpus, and it was discussed in extenso. The Attorney General took the position that since the President was charged with the enforcement of the law the writ of habeas corpus was a necessary element in the enforcement of the law. But it has never reached the courts, as I understand, and it has never been in Congress for an affirmative decision.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. It has reached the courts.

Mr. FESS. At what time?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. On the proposition there are a large number of decisions.

Mr. FESS. What I want to get at is, who has the authority, Congress or the President? That has not reached the courts, has it?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would not undertake to say, except that what has been done has been sustained by the courts, and it having been acquiesced in, I should say it has been conceded. To follow that thought further, it being acquiesced in here that the President of the United States has the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus over all the territory over which the sovereignty of the United States extends, this proposition contained in the bill is merely a direction as to how it may be done, giving to the Governor General first that power, but reserving in the supreme Executive the authority in this country to override it.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. On page 4 in the bill of rights in this bill it expressly gives that right to either the President or the Governor General.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is correct. I had overlooked it, and I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin for calling attention to it. This other provision is simply a detailed proposition in enforcing it.

Mr. COOPER. I will say that this is a most tremendous power to give to these two men, and it ought to be hedged about with every sort of a safeguard.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that the object of this provision is to so hedge about the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus that it may not be suspended for a longer period than is necessary to enable the Governor General to communicate with the President of the United States.

Mr. MILLER. On that point may I make a further inquiry? It is true, as the gentleman from Wisconsin says, that the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus is lodged in the Governor General and the President of the United States. They are coordinate in power and strength. Suppose the Governor General does suspend it and the President of the United States orders him to withdraw the suspension. Does the gentleman think there is any other way for the President of the United States to enforce his will other than to remove the Governor General?

Mr. JONES. That would be a very effective way of enforcing it, and it would be an entirely adequate one, I think.

Mr. MILLER. That leads me to inquire exactly what does that language mean? Is that intended that the President shall override the Governor General?

Mr. JONES. That is the meaning of the language which requires the Governor General to communicate with the President—that is, confer with the President. The Governor General would not suspend the writ except under very grave circumstances, and the bill proposes that when he does so, he shall confer with the President in regard to it. Should the President not approve the action of the Governor General in suspending the writ, that action would be immediately revoked, I take it.

Mr. MILLER. I think that is a splendid position for the bill to take. I think the President of the United States ought to have supervisory power over the Governor General, over those, as the gentleman from Wisconsin says, ulterior powers, but I do not believe it is given in this bill.

Mr. JONES. That is the purpose of this language, and I believe it fully accomplishes it.

Mr. MILLER. Would the gentleman be willing to reserve that particular point in this paragraph so that we may see if it would not be better to redraft this provision?

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to returning to this paragraph to consider this particular matter, but I do not believe there is any real necessity for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question pending is the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER. The amendment I offered was to strike out a part of the language in line 4, page 18, and substitute other language.

Mr. JONES. I thought the gentleman, following the colloquy with me, withdrew that, or stated to the gentleman from Tennessee that he would not offer it.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, no; I think it is a splendid amendment, and I hope it will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, has the Chair submitted the unanimous request made by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Virginia, that this section be passed over as to the matter indicated?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. JONES. I thought it had been submitted and agreed to. I ask unanimous consent that this part of the paragraph may be passed over and returned to for the purpose of amendment, if it be thought necessary, of the language employed in lines 3 and 4 and 5, on page 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the paragraph in this section be now passed, and be returned to, if necessary, as to the language in lines 3, 4, and 5, page 19. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 22. That, except as provided otherwise in this act, the executive departments of the Philippine government shall continue as now authorized by law until otherwise provided by the Philippine Legislature. When the Philippine Legislature herein provided shall convene and organize, the Philippine Commission, as such, shall cease and determine and the members thereof, except the Governor General and heads of executive departments, shall vacate their offices as members of said commission. The Philippine Legislature may thereafter by appropriate legislation increase the number or abolish any of the executive departments, or make such changes in the names and duties thereof as it may see fit, and shall provide for the appointment and removal of the heads of the executive departments by the Governor General, and may provide that heads of executive departments shall have seats in either or both houses of the legislature, with the right of debating or voting or both: Provided, That all executive functions of the government must be directly under the Governor General or within one of the executive departments under the supervision and control of the Governor General. There shall be established by the Philippine Legislature a bureau, to be known as the bureau of non-Christian tribes, which said bureau shall be embraced in one of the executive departments to be designated by the Governor General, and shall have general supervision over the public affairs of the inhabitants of the territory represented in the legislature by appointive senators and representatives.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 13, after the word "have," insert "executive control." Line 14, before the word "supervision," insert the word "administrative," so that the clause will read: "And shall have executive control and general administrative supervision over the public affairs."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I of course could make a motion to strike out the entire provision for the Philippine Bureau, but owing to the fact that the matter has been passed on in substance I do not care to take up the time of the committee with it. I think, however, this amendment ought to be adopted, and I ask the committee's attention while I suggest the reason for it. The committee understands that the legislative power which is conferred in this bill over the territory and the non-Christian tribes is really placed within the Philippine Legislature. All legislative power is granted to the Philippine Legislature. It is, of course, intended by this provision, which constitutes a bureau to be known as the "Bureau of non-Christian tribes," that the executive power should be given to this bureau. The words used here are:

And shall have general supervision over the public affairs of the inhabitants—

And so forth.

I hardly think that language is sufficient to clearly indicate that what is intended is administrative and executive power. The provision as it will read if the amendment which I offer prevails is:

And shall have executive control and general administrative supervision over the public affairs of the inhabitants of the territory—

And so forth.

That will make the matter entirely clear. It will leave the legislative power with the legislature and will expressly state that the administrative power is to be exercised by the bureau which is created in this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, on the 4th day of last July I had the very distinguished pleasure of listening to a speech by the President of the United States. Among other things in that speech, he used this language:

There are some gentlemen in Washington, for example, at this very moment who are showing themselves very patriotic in a way which does not attract wide attention, but seems to belong to mere everyday obligations. Those Members of the House and Senate who stay in hot Washington to maintain a quorum of the House and transact the all-important business of the Nation are doing an act of patriotism. I honor them for it, and I am glad to stay there and stick by them until the work is done.

As I read these lines I think of the notice in the papers this morning that the different members of the Cabinet have their dates fixed now to go through the country to make political speeches, and I wonder how the President of the United States would characterize these gentlemen.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Washington will not press the talk along that line further at this time. It is not in order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold his point for just a moment, until I make a statement to him? I think that this question of adjournment—and that is what I am going to talk about—may not be in order, but it is something that everybody wants to hear about, and besides that fact, Mr. Chairman, we are all in a hurry to get through with this bill, and I think that to make a few remarks about adjournment right now would greatly facilitate the passage of the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, withholding the point of order for a moment, the committee in preparing for the consideration of this bill expressly provided that the debate shall be limited to the bill. I have no objection to the gentleman talking about political matters. I have never objected to a political discussion on the floor of the House, and I have never objected to gentlemen extending their remarks upon political subjects in the RECORD, except when they sought it at an improper time. I do not think the gentleman ought to ask us to permit this to be injected at this time, and I make the point of order——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman does that, does not the gentleman recall that last Friday, without any objection from that side, one of the distinguished Members on that side, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], was permitted to make a political speech and take up 15 minutes of time, and nobody objected on either side of the House? Does not the gentleman think——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That was not upon this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, I think so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That was on a conference report and not upon this bill. There has not been a political speech made during the consideration of this bill. The gentleman from West Virginia spoke on a conference report and not on this bill. The gentleman from Washington knows my disposition. I want to be courteous to those in the House, but I hope he will not press this at this time. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking in order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I supposed the gentleman would do that.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly; and I will do it every time there is any objection. If the gentleman thinks he is going to make progress by permitting gentlemen on that side to make political speeches and not on this, he is mistaken.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I repeat again that there has been no political speech made on this side of the House during the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And I give the gentleman notice that there will be on this side unless they keep a quorum here.

The CHAIRMAN. Both gentlemen are out of order. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-three Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ADAIR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18459, and finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 247 Members answered to their names—a quorum—and he presented the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. TOWNER), there were—ayes 20, noes 58.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the word "representatives," in line 16, page 20, the following: "The head of said bureau, together with his office and field assistants, shall be appointed by the Governor General without the consent of the Philippine Senate."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, habit plays a very large part in our lives. It determines most of the acts we perform from the time we open our eyes at morn until we close them at night. Habit is the greatest aid to humanity and all living organisms. Without it life would not be worth living, but now and then habit seems to play a peculiar prank and sometimes is antagonistic to good. I wish in this connection to call the attention of gentlemen on the other side of the aisle that they should not always let habit prevail. At times the mind should prevail; at times thought should be present; at times conscience should be heard; at times a practical consideration of the bill ought to be had. Now, the amendment just offered from this side by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] was agreed to by the acting head on the other side of the aisle, the gentleman in charge of the bill, but the habit on that side prevailed and they voted it down. [Laughter.] Now, I do not know as we can accomplish any good by offering these wholesome amendments, which we do if habit is to continue. But I think, Mr. Chairman, that a good purpose should not be easily thwarted, and while I am a little bit discouraged, a confession I make with reluctance, still I have some determination remaining and I shall persevere for a little time longer. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle will kindly forsake habit and return to a conscious existence for a moment, I shall therefore and thereupon direct their attention to the amendment which I have proposed. I am not going to open up the discussion of the wild or non-Christian tribes again to-day, although I think it would be profitable.

I think it highly desirable as a matter of giving an opportunity for various views to be expressed, but I do want to say one or two things in this connection. I do not believe the majority members of the committee have been very happy in the solution they have arrived at respecting the non-Christian people, and we are going to reap the result of the lack of wisdom herein manifested quicker than in any other respect in the bill. At the same time I wish it to be stated that I appreciate the extreme difficulty confronting the membership of the committee in framing the bill in respect to this item, and it would not be surprising if some mistakes were made. I do believe we ought to have a full and free discussion of the government of the non-Christian people and see if we can not possibly reach a solution that will be more nearly right than any that has yet been proposed. In this connection I desire to call attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that habit is again running rampant on that side and private conversation has drowned out my stentorian voice.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] in his opening statement to the House felicitated the Government in the Philippines and the people of the United States upon the auspicious fact that the Moro Province had been pacified and civil government therein established without the aid of soldiers. That is perhaps not quite a correct statement to make of his position, as he hardly said it had been pacified without the aid of soldiers, but he conveyed the impression that the beneficial change which has recently occurred and that the pacification which now exists is there without the aid of soldiers. Now, I do think that his statement ought not to go unanswered. Why, the Moro country is full of soldiers. I myself went through the Moro country always with soldiers. When we crossed the little Island of Jolo—went nearly across it—we arrived there only two days after a battle, and there were 150 soldiers ahead and about 100 behind all the way over and back.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I understand that it was some time last year when the gentleman was in the Philippines?

Mr. MILLER. It was in the latter part of October.

Mr. JONES. That was before a civilian was made——

Mr. MILLER. The change was being made while I was there.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman does not mean to deny, I suppose, that a great many of the soldiers have been withdrawn from that Province since that time, and that there are not near so many, if any, there now as there were when he was in the islands?

Mr. MILLER. That leads to the statement I was just prepared to make. If the gentleman had stated that the troops of the United States—that is, the Caucasian troops of the United States—had been withdrawn from the Moro country, he would have stated it exactly right. They were withdrawn while I was there, but in their place were substituted other troops. There was sent a larger force of constabulary and several battalions of scouts, officered, of course, by Americans; so that while the Caucasian troops had been withdrawn from the Moro country, yet, as a matter of fact, there are just about as many troops there now as there ever have been, but they are native troops officered largely by Americans.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will admit that the constabulary are not United States troops? They are controlled by the civil government and paid by the Filipino people.

Mr. MILLER. I did not for a moment state that they were United States troops. I made the distinction very clear.

Mr. JONES. There was no other inference that could be drawn from the gentleman's words.

Mr. MILLER. I think if the gentleman will read my statement he will see that he misunderstood me.

Now, I can not help calling attention to the fact that by the arrangement of this bill, to my mind, we are going to repeat in the Philippine Islands the mistakes we have made in America in years past in dealing with the Indian tribes, only we are going to multiply those mistakes ten, or twenty, or even a hundredfold. We ought to have learned something from the experience that we have had. It is a sad enough chapter in our history. It is only within the past generation, in fact, that we have come to look upon the Indian question in the United States in what may be termed a sane and sensible light. We have altogether too far permitted in this country the whites who were in the vicinity of the places occupied by the Indians to prey upon them in one way or another. Now, you have a vastly more severe situation in the Philippines. There never was at any time within the confines of the United States more than 300,000 Indians. You have four times that number of non-Christian wild people in the Philippine Islands to-day, in a territory that comprises 120,000 square miles, smaller than some of the States of the Union. And the bill as framed will inevitably result in perpetuating in the islands conditions for which we blush in our own country.

Now, returning to the amendment which I offer, I do not care to discuss it at large. I understand there is a disposition on the other side of the aisle to vote down anything and everything that we propose along this line, whether it is meritorious or not. But I wish to say that this amendment provides that the Governor General may appoint, without the consent of the Philippine Senate, such officials as he will desire to have charged with the responsibility of administering the affairs of the non-Christian people under this bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman was very unjust to this side when he said there was a disposition to vote down everything proposed by the other side.

Mr. MILLER. I had reference to the confirmation feature.

Mr. JONES. I think the gentleman knows that this side has voted for a number of amendments proposed by his side, and I am perfectly free to say that I think some of those amendments improve the bill. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that there had been some informal agreement, such as the gentleman suggests, about an amendment which was defeated a few moments ago, but I think that side, and especially one gentleman from that side, my friend from the State of Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], was responsible for that. He brought into this House, by raising the question of a quorum, one or two hundred Members who had not heard any part of this discussion and who knew nothing about the subject under discussion. It was not discussed after they came in, and therefore they had no knowledge of what was taking place.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman wish to imply that the membership on his side usually votes without knowing anything about a proposition?

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that he knows perfectly well that is not true, and he also knows that a great many of the gentlemen who were brought in were members of the minority. They voted for the amendment because they saw the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] standing up, and without knowing anything about the proposition. Possibly members of the majority who had just entered the Chamber voted the other way for the same reason.

Mr. MILLER. I assumed, therefore, when the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle saw the gentleman from Virginia voting for the amendment they would follow their leader, but they did not even look.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I now wish to direct my remarks for a moment to the merits of the amendment which the gentleman has offered. I do not agree with his conclusions. I think that this bureau, like all other bureaus in the Philippines, ought to be under the general supervision of the Governor General, and I can see no reason why its chief should be exempt from confirmation by the senate any more than the head of any other bureau.

Mr. MILLER. We have had some little badinage back and forth, but really and seriously, now, does the gentleman not think it would be very advisable to let the Governor General be charged, without restriction by the Philippine Senate, with the duties of administering the affairs of the non-Christian people?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman was not listening a moment ago, when I said I did not think it would be wise to accept his amendment. I do not believe that there is any good reason, as I have just said, why the head of this bureau should be exempt from confirmation by the senate any more than the head of any other bureau. I have heard a great many statements coming from the other side of the Chamber to the effect that there was a great deal of feeling between the Filipinos and the Moros, and that the Moros would not be fairly treated by the Filipinos. I am perfectly familiar, and have been for a long time, with the evidence which gentlemen have brought forward in support of that proposition. I am familiar with the views of the gentleman from Minnesota on the subject. He delivered a long speech upon this subject soon after he returned from the Philippine Islands, and he then delivered personally to the Congress of the United States a message, if I am not mistaken, which he said a datto, with tears in his eyes, had requested him to deliver.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman's recollection of that is a little bit confused. That message was not from a Moro, but from a Bukidnon.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I think, notwithstanding what has been said upon this subject by gentlemen on the other side, that since all Filipinos are of Malay origin, and there is a kinship between them all, we can certainly intrust to the Christianized, civilized Filipinos the government of the wild, savage, un-Christian, and uncivilized people of the islands more safely than we can intrust it to any American.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. I do not know who the Governor General will appoint as the head of this bureau if opportunity is given to him—whether he will appoint an American or a Filipino. He can appoint either an American or a Filipino, but whoever he shall appoint, his appointment should be subject to the confirmation of the Philippine Senate.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. MILLER. Seriously, my amendment is in harmony with the provisions which I thought the gentleman from Virginia desired to have contained in the bill, inasmuch as in the provision relating to the senators and representatives appointed by the Governor General to represent these non-Christian people he specifically excepts those appointees from the necessity of confirmation by the Philippine Senate.

Now, in harmony with that, would the gentleman not say that the head or superintendent, or whatever you may wish to call the man in charge of this bureau, and his assistants, should also be appointed without confirmation by the senate?

Mr. JONES. I think, Mr. Chairman, we went as far as we ought to go when we permitted the Governor General to appoint these senators and representatives without confirmation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 16, after the word "representatives," insert the following: "Provided, That the legislative sessions of the Philippine Legislature shall be limited to 120 days in each year."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that proposition has been passed upon fully in a previous section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington wish to discuss the point of order?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes. My understanding is that the gentleman is mistaken as to the facts.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No. If the gentleman from Washington had been here, he would know that that is not so.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Gentleman who have been here make a contrary statement about it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. The provision we have passed limits each annual regular session to 90 days. The Governor General, however, is authorized thereafter to call as many extra sessions per year as he wants to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. My friend from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] was here, and he ought to know that he is not justified in making that statement. We made the sessions unlimited, and——

Mr. JONES. We did that at the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], so that it certainly has been passed upon.

Mr. MILLER. My attention must certainly have been diverted at the time by something else, if that is so. But, with all due deference to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], I think the committee ought not to have accepted that amendment.

Mr. MOORE Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that these gentlemen are all proceeding out of order. Not one of them has addressed the Chair in the usual way.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, first, that that subject matter has already been passed upon; and, second, that it is not germane to this section.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the Chair will hear me a moment, I think it is germane to this section. I have not been here all the time so as to know whether it has been offered heretofore or not, but if there is a dispute as to the fact I do not think the amendment ought to be considered as out of order.

Mr. JONES. There is no dispute as to the fact.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Washington, I know, will not dispute the word of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. If the gentleman from Washington will not stay here, then all he has to do is to read the RECORD in order to keep himself informed.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not profess to read all the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that I be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr HUMPHREY] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In order or on some other subject?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. On some other subject.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I object.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-two Members are present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ADAIR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 18459, the Philippine Island bill, finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and 220 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question pending was the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 16, after the word "representatives," insert "provided the Philippine Legislature shall not pass any law permitting the legislature to remain in session during a period of 30 days next preceding a general election in the Philippine Islands."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not germane to this paragraph. A prior section of the bill fixes the right of the legislature to determine when it may meet, and a prior section of the bill also gives the full right of the legislature to determine when it shall adjourn. The amendment is not offered to the right place in the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. This amendment of mine does not provide when the legislature shall adjourn. It only says when it shall not be in session. It provides that the Philippine Legislature shall not pass a law permitting them to be in session 30 days preceding a general election. I think it is clearly in order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this section relates entirely to the executive department of the government. The legislative part has already been passed. This amendment is not germane to this section of the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman is mistaken about it, because this section provides in the first sentences that except provided otherwise in this act, the executive departments of the Philippine Government shall not continue as now authorized by law until otherwise provided by the Philippine Legislature, and then as to when the Philippine Legislature shall convene and organize. My amendment is to restrict the authority of the legislature to pass a law permitting the legislature to sit 30 days before general election.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair is of the opinion that this amendment is not germane to this section, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 5, after the word "both," insert the following: "Provided, That no leave of absence shall be granted such heads of executive departments to enable them to deliver political addresses during the session of the legislature."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on that amendment. Mr. Chairman, a while ago I quoted what our distinguished President said about gentlemen remaining here performing their duties. He stated that they were patriotic, and I had just gotten to the point in my speech where I propounded the inquiry that it might be interesting to the country to know what the President thought about members of the Cabinet who are going to leave their duties and go forth to make political speeches. Some of them have already left. I wondered whether that was a patriotic performance. I have wondered what the President might think of the performance of some Members of this House. For instance, there was my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Can the gentleman inform the House whether the Cabinet members are being docked for every day that they are absent?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think it is perfectly safe to say that they are not. My distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] was gone about three months, and I was wondering whether he was unpatriotic when he was in Texas and only patriotic when he was in the House. Then there is another distinguished gentleman [Mr. PALMER] who seems to be favored by the President, who was instrumental a few days ago, or perhaps some weeks ago, in conveying to the Judiciary Committee the fact that the President had kicked another plank out of the rotten Baltimore platform, the one in relation to only one term for President. That distinguished gentleman sometimes appears on the floor of this House.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman refers to the Democratic platform. Does the gentleman know that that document has not been incorporated in the Democratic Handbook which is now being circulated for Democratic orators?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; that is like the section in reference to the high cost of living.

Mr. MOORE. Gone out.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Gone out. There were 15 pages in the Democratic campaign textbook two years ago about the high cost of living, but not a single word in it this time, and I wonder why. I supposed our Democratic friends would be anxious to show in the textbook how they had reduced the high cost of living, but I suppose they took it for granted because they did not say anything about it.

Mr. MOORE. Does not the gentleman know that that is all on account of the European war?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Washington is not addressing himself to the amendment or the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Tennessee is correct, and I will proceed in order.

Mr. MOORE. I withdraw my question about the European war, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, to call attention to the language in lines 17 to 22, on page 19:

When the Philippine Legislature herein provided shall convene and organize, the Philippine Commission, as such, shall cease and determine and the members thereof, except the Governor General and heads of executive departments, shall vacate their offices as members of said commission.

I would like to call the attention of both sides of the Chamber to the result of this paragraph if it goes into effect. When we take the paragraph in connection with the preceding paragraph relative to the elective senate, we will notice it is the passing of the Philippine Commission, and probably it ought to pass. I rather think I would be in favor of an elective senate, which would necessitate a doing away with the commission, but since this is the paragraph in which the passing of the commission is noted, I just take the time to emphasize what I think has been a remarkable success by the commission form of government. I believe that when that first commission was appointed, at the head of which was President Schurman, of Cornell University, having associated with him some of the strong men of our country, that there never was a group of men sitting outside of the territorial limits of our country more devoted to the solution of a great problem than that commission, and I think what they did was really a remarkable achievement, and then when that commission gave way to the second commission, which gave a little more authority to the Filipino, a little more liberality, I think that the second commission did a work that we ought not to ignore, and I do not think anybody on either side of the Chamber desires to ignore it—a commission headed by a man who afterwards was President of the Nation, probably the best-fitted man in the country to take that position. It seems to me that the commission form of government that has had such a wide latitude in the last few years, applicable to the cities of our country, especially as witnessed in the Capital City, is a form that has not only been worked out in our own country but has shown remarkable fruits in that far-away country in the southern seas, and as we are now passing it over, and it is to become a mere matter of memory in history, I rose simply to say that I think the work of the commission in the Philippine Islands is such that this Nation ought to be proud of it. I want to say what I said the other day, that I do not believe there is another single instance in the history of all the world where there has been such remarkable work done for a far-away people by a great Republic, and done in such a disinterested manner, as was done in this instance. Whether the movement that you are considering is justifiable or not, it is of the present, and whatever shall be the future, I think that the past in regard to our action with the Filipino is something that we ought to be proud of, and I want to leave that word here as we pass this paragraph. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a word in connection with what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has said. I can not assent to a great deal that he has said in respect to the Philippine Commission—indeed, I am obliged to dissent very earnestly from a great deal of it—but I do wish to indorse what he said in regard to Prof. Schurman, and I wish also to call the attention of the House to the fact that Prof. Schurman has gone on record in the most emphatic manner as to the capacity of the Filipino people for self-government. He has declared, as a result of his long acquaintance with the Filipinos during the time he was president of the commission, that they are fully capable of exercising the powers of self-government.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman kindly inform the House how many years ago it was that President Schurman made that statement?

Mr. JONES. I will very gladly do so. It was years ago.

Mr. MILLER. Thirteen years ago?

Mr. JONES. Yes; probably so.

Mr. MILLER. If they were then fitted for self-government, why not give it to them now; why not give them independence at this time?

Mr. JONES. That was 13 years ago; and if, according to President Schurman, they were fit for self-government at that time, they certainly must be now, having had the valuable assistance which the gentleman from Ohio thinks was given them for so many years by the Philippine Commission.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. MOORE. I understand there is no amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 16, after the word "representatives," insert: "Provided, That heads of executive departments shall devote their entire time to their official duties during the terms for which they shall have been appointed."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, we are told throughout this debate that we are taking the hand of our weaker brother in the Philippines and are endeavoring to put him on his feet. If we have any weaknesses in our Government, perhaps it is well if we should point them out to him, since we are undertaking to give him a form of government very much like our own. We ought to start out right, and if we have made any mistakes we ought to give our Philippines brother the advantage of our experience so that he may not stumble into the same pitfalls. A constant source of complaint in this country, if the newspaper reports are to be taken into consideration at all, arises from the fact that certain public officials do not devote their entire time to the offices to which they have been elected or appointed, and that they are in the habit, some of them, of leaving their official duties for the purpose of increasing their revenues. With a people not so strong as we are, who are going to establish a government for themselves under our tuition and direction, it would seem proper that we should say to them, "When you accept a public office, you ought to perform the duties of that office; and when you accept a great position under your Government, like unto that of a Member of Congress, or if you become a cabinet officer, along with your Governor General, or whoever in the course of time shall come to direct your affairs, then, rather than go out upon the stump delivering political lectures or going out into some Philippine Chautauqua for the purpose of making, say, $250 per night, you should devote your entire time to the duties for which you were elected and for which the people make payment to you. This," we should say to them, "is your bounden duty not only in morals but under the oath of office which you take. We set this example before you and say to you, 'thus far shall you go and no farther.' We want you to learn that pure, old, simple Democratic doctrine of living within your income, and not living at so extravagant a rate that you can not subsist upon your salary, even though it be $12,000 per annum."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman expect a Democrat to live on $12,000?

Mr. MOORE. Not when he is in power. When a Democrat is out of power I expect him to live on most anything and charge up almost everything in the way of extravagance to the Republican Party. When a Democrat is in power I expect to see him roll along in automobiles or gilded chariots. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] or the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] how many executive departments there will be if this bill becomes the law?

Mr. JONES. Four; just the number they have now.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I notice in lines 3, 4, and 5, page 20, that the heads of the executive departments are to have seats in either or both houses of the legislature, and with the right of debate or voting, or both. The President is to appoint or remove the heads of the executive departments.

Mr. JONES. No; not under this bill. Under this bill they are appointed by the Governor General.

Mr. COOPER. What did I say? I meant the Governor General. It is provided at the top of the same page that the Governor General is to appoint and remove the heads of executive departments. There is also on page 12 a provision that for the territory not now represented in the Philippine Assembly the Governor General shall appoint one senator and nine representatives.

Now, if there are only 12 members of the senate, and if the senator appointed by the Governor General to represent this territory is to have a vote and each of the 4 heads of the executive departments is to have a vote, then the Governor General would have 5 votes, practically—that is, his 5 appointees would—in an assembly of only 17. That is one-third of the vote.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that the bill provides for 12 senatorial districts with 2 senators from each district. That will make 24 senators.

Mr. COOPER. Then his appointees would have but five of the votes in the senate.

Mr. JONES. Only two of his appointees under the provisions of this bill would have a vote in the senate. One of those appointees would probably come from the southern part of the archipelago and the other from the northern part, where the mountain tribes reside. This bill simply gives the power to the legislature to permit these heads of departments to vote, so that if they were permitted to vote by the legislature that would be 6 out of 24, which is one-fourth of the total number.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. That the supreme court and the courts of first instance of the Philippine Islands shall possess and exercise jurisdiction as heretofore provided and such additional jurisdiction as shall hereafter be prescribed by law. The municipal courts of said islands shall possess and exercise jurisdiction as now provided by law, subject in all matters to such alteration and amendment as may be hereafter enacted by law; and the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court shall hereafter be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States. The judges of the court of first instance shall be appointed by the Governor General, by and with the advice and consent of the Philippine Senate: Provided, That the admiralty jurisdiction of the supreme court and courts of first instance shall not be changed except by act of Congress.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 13, after the word "Congress," insert: "That in all cases pending under the operation of existing laws, both criminal and civil, the jurisdiction shall continue until final judgment and determination."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, there is no provision in the act that in cases pending where change is made between the present form of government and the new form, if this bill shall become the law, that the cases then pending shall continue until final judgment and determination, and jurisdiction shall be granted for that purpose. It is not necessary for me to argue in favor of that, I presume.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I think there will be no objection on this side.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia if the jurisdiction of the courts of first instance in the islands, as provided in lines 25 and 26, on page 20, and lines 1 and 2, page 21, can be changed by any law of the Philippine Legislature?

Mr. JONES. Yes; the power is given to the legislature under this bill to change——

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman think that such a power as that should now be conferred on this practically new legislature to change the jurisdiction of the supreme court of the islands?

Mr. JONES. Not the supreme court. I thought the gentleman said the courts of first instance. The legislature now has that power, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. To change the jurisdiction of the supreme court of the islands?

Mr. JONES. Yes; the supreme court and courts of first instance. I correct myself. It has it of both courts.

Mr. COOPER. And we have had there all the time, of course, the commission, all three of which until recently have consisted of Americans, and it occurs to me——

Mr. JONES. The gentleman knows, however, there is no law that ever required that the three should belong to any particular race.

Mr. COOPER. That is true. The language in line 2, page 21, is that the jurisdiction shall be as heretofore provided, "and such additional jurisdiction as shall hereafter be prescribed by law."

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Then you provide in the proviso, line 12, same section, on page 21, that the admiralty jurisdiction of the supreme court and courts of first instance shall not be changed except by act of Congress?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. So they can change all other jurisdiction, civil and criminal, except the admiralty jurisdiction?

Mr. JONES. Yes. And it is obvious, I know, to the gentleman why we did not change the admiralty jurisdiction.

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The gentleman from Virginia, chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, in his opening remarks observed that the legislature in the Philippine Islands during the past year had not reduced the salaries of any of the judges in the islands. I know he does not want a misstatement to appear on the record, and therefore I take this opportunity to submit an observation. It may not have come to the attention of the gentleman, but nevertheless it is a fact that the legislature last winter removed from office every judge of first instance in the islands. Now, I hope the membership of the committee will grasp that in its entirety. The legislature by an enactment absolutely abolished every judge of first instance in the islands; that is, vacated the offices and increased the number, which was a very proper thing to do, because the number had come to be insufficient. It opened them all up to reappointment by the Governor General, and the Governor General did appoint judges to all of these positions, and they reduced the salaries of the judges of the courts of first instance, which are the trial courts of the islands. We would call them nisi prius courts.

Now, I do not wish it to be understood by the remark which I have made that any serious havoc resulted. I have said some things in criticism of the present Governor General. I want to say something in his praise. The present Governor General reappointed every old judge in the islands except one, and, as I understand it, that one judge did not desire to be reappointed; I think he resigned a little bit before. So that in administering the new law passed by the Philippine Legislature the Governor General exercised excellent discretion, excellent conservatism, excellent judgment, with the entire approbation and approval of the Philippine people.

But I do think this ought to be said, Mr. Chairman. I do not believe that judges of the courts of the first instance there were being paid a salary a bit too high. I said to myself while I was there, as many another man has said, that some of the officials connected with the Government of the Philippines were being paid a salary a little too high. But the salary of the judges of the courts of first instance was a very, very moderate salary, and the amount of the reduction, it seems to me, was unfortunate, although it was not very severe. I make this statement because if it should come to the attention of any of the people there interested, they will know that some of us at least do not believe in reducing materially the salary of the judges.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the statement which I made, as the gentleman will recall, was based on a cablegram which was sent by Gov. Gen. Harrison to the Secretary of War, in which he stated that the expenditures of the government had been reduced to the extent of $1,000,000, and that that had been accomplished without reducing the salary of any of the judicial officers.

Mr. MILLER. That was prior to the enactment of that law.

Mr. JONES. I do not recall at this moment whether that cablegram was prior to the 1st day of July or subsequent thereto. If it was prior to the 1st day of July, of course there would be no conflict between the statement of the Governor General and that made by the gentleman from Minnesota. The courts were reorganized under an act of the legislature which was carried into effect on the 1st day of July, and it may be that since the 1st day of July, as the gentleman states, some of the salaries of the judges have been reduced.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. JONES. I do not know as to that, and I am perfectly willing to accept the gentleman's statement if he says he knows they have been. He says there have been moderate reductions, and I simply want to say that I am quite sure that if these reductions were made, as the gentleman says they have been—and his statement I do not question—they were proper reductions and have not at all interfered with the efficiency of the courts. The Governor General of the islands has been greatly complimented upon his action taken in pursuance to the law providing for the reorganization of the courts. An opportunity was given him to play politics, so to speak, if he had desired to do so. He, however, reappointed all of the old judges, I believe, and most of the seven new appointments were deserved promotions, I think. It is generally admitted that they were the best that could have been made under the circumstances. I never heard of the slightest criticism of the Governor General on account of anyone of his judicial appointments. On the contrary, his course has been universally commended.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 25. That the Supreme Court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to review, revise, reverse, modify, or affirm the final judgments and decrees of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands in all actions, cases, causes, and proceedings now pending therein or hereafter determined thereby in which the Constitution or any statute, treaty, title, right, or privilege of the United States is involved; and such final judgments or decrees may and can be reviewed, revised, reversed, modified, or affirmed by said Supreme Court of the United States on appeal or writ of error by the party aggrieved within the same time, in the same manner, under the same regulations, and by the same procedure, as far as applicable, as the final judgments and decrees of the district courts of the United States.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting after the word "involved," line 20, page 21, the following: "or any causes in which the value in controversy exceeds $25,000 or in which the title or possession of real estate exceeding in value the sum of $25,000, to be ascertained by the oath of either party or by other competent witnesses, is involved or brought in question."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire whether there is any disposition on the part of the chairman of the committee to accept this amendment?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is that the present law?

Mr. MILLER. That is exactly the present law. I copied it exactly from the organic act.

Mr. COOPER. May we have it reported again?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, some of the Members did not quite hear all of the amendment. May we have it reported once more?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MILLER. If the chairman of the committee will indicate whether or not he feels inclined to accept that amendment, it will enable us to expedite the consideration of it. At any rate, I would like to be heard in support of the amendment. I sincerely trust it will be the wisdom of the committee to accept it, and it is offered with the utmost seriousness for the benefit of the people of the Philippine Islands. It is of no benefit to the United States, nor is there any benefit to any official of the United States.

But there is a decided benefit in it to the people of the Philippine Islands, and we may as well know why. Whether it ought to or not is not the question. As a matter of fact, in the Philippine Islands there is a great shortage of money with which to do business. I suppose economically the greatest handicap of all is the lack of money. They are absolutely dependent, just as we were in this country at one time—largely dependent—upon foreign countries for loans. Now, it is unquestioned to the Filipino people themselves that if their industries are to be developed and their resources utilized they must borrow money from abroad. It may not be that they will borrow money from the United States. Maybe they will. If they do not borrow it from here, they will have to borrow it from some other country that has it to loan, and there are many other countries that have citizens there who have invested large sums of money in the islands.

It might not be out of place to add that several lines of business peculiarly adapted to the Philippines require large sums of money for their conduct. For instance, take the sugar business, which I feel is going to be one of the greatest blessings to the people there when developed. Under the simple methods and the ancient ways of sugar cultivation and manufacture from 40 to 60 per cent of the valuable part of the product was lost and wasted. It can only be utilized and the industry can only be made profitable by the building of centrals, by the building of sugar-manufacturing plants—not refineries—that require the investment of millions; and everybody there, as well as everybody here familiar with the sugar business, knows how essential that is.

Now, they have got to borrow money from some place, and business men and people interested in the islands inform me that this provision is really necessary, in order that there may be a proper investment of foreign capital in the islands. It is a practical matter that is of the utmost importance. Without it, I believe the rate of interest in the islands will be very much higher than it would be with it in the bill. If this is retained in the bill, not only will capital move into the islands for the development of the islands with much greater rapidity than it now does, but it can be obtained on much more advantageous terms than it now can be obtained.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two or three minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Minnesota be permitted to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the prevailing rate of interest in the islands now, as you discovered while you were in the islands, say, in Manila?

Mr. MILLER. I can not say what the prevailing rate of interest is, but I know that the rate of interest on money loaned out to the people is very high.

Mr. GOULDEN. From what sources outside of the islands themselves are the largest investments made?

Mr. MILLER. The largest investments are from England. Then I found some Swiss with large investments. The largest single investment in the islands is that of the Tobaccolera Co. It is a Spanish and French concern, and it has been there for many years. Then there are some very large American investments already made and being made in the islands.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the present war in Europe require the calling in of much of those investments?

Mr. MILLER. I do not believe they can call them in, but there will be no further investment from those countries in the islands in the next few months. I do not know how it will be in the years to come. But I do believe it will be of the utmost benefit to the people of the islands to reduce the interest rate and provide them with capital.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I quite agree with the purpose which the gentleman had in mind in offering his amendment. I wish to ask him whether he has considered the clogging of the dockets of the Supreme Court with these cases, and whether it would not serve the same purpose to provide, as we do in cases from courts on the Canal Zone, for appeals to be taken to the circuit court of appeals?

Mr. MILLER. No; I do not believe that would do at all. I do not think we should make the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands second to any court in the world excepting the Supreme Court of the United States; and I want to go on record as saying that the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands is a magnificent court, and the native members of that court are men of the highest learning and of the utmost probity and capacity. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not true that the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands enjoys the unique distinction of never having had reversed a single appeal from it to the Supreme Court of the United States, but that all of its decisions have been affirmed?

Mr. MILLER. That is true.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. TOWNER. Of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands as it is at present constituted?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir. The gentleman is mistaken. I will say to him, however, that there have been 17 appeals under the present provision, which permits appeals where property to the value of $25,000 is involved, and there has been but 1 of the 17 cases reversed.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman is taking into consideration not the present supreme court, but the entire record of courts that have been formed in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. JONES. No. I mean the court as it has been established since the organic law went into effect.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, referring to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], in so far as his statement bears upon the congestion of business before our Supreme Court, the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] really answers that completely. In a period of 12 years there have been 17 appeals under this clause. That is only about one a year. Now, it is not desired that there shall be many appeals. There will not be many. I suppose if this is retained in the bill in the next 12 years there will not be nearly as many as there were in the previous 12 years. There may not be more than one or two.

But that is not what I am asking for. I want it inserted in the bill, in the organic act that is to be enacted here, as a safeguard to prospective investors, so that money can be obtained on more advantageous terms for the upbuilding and development of the Philippine Islands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 32.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 26. That the Government of the Philippine Islands may grant franchises and rights, including the authority to exercise the right of eminent domain, for the construction and operation of works of public utility and service, and may authorize said works to be constructed and maintained over and across the public property of the United States, including streets, highways, squares, and reservations, and over similar property of the government of said islands, and may adopt rules and regulations under which the provincial and municipal governments of the islands may grant the right to use and occupy such public property belonging to said Provinces or municipalities: Provided, That no private property shall be taken for any purpose under this section without just compensation paid or tendered therefor, and that such authority to take and occupy land shall not authorize the taking, use, or occupation of any land except such as is required for the actual necessary purposes for which the franchise is granted, and that no franchise or right shall be granted to any corporation except under the conditions that it shall be subject to amendment alteration, or repeal by the Congress of the United States, and that lands or rights of use and occupation of lands thus granted shall revert to the governments by which they were respectively granted upon the termination of the franchises and rights under which they were granted or upon their revocation or repeal. That all franchises or rights granted under this act shall forbid the issue of stock or bonds except in exchange for actual cash or for property at a fair valuation equal to the par value of the stock or bonds so issued; shall forbid the declaring of stock or bond dividends, and, in the case of public-service corporations, shall provide for the effective regulation of the charges thereof, for the official inspection and regulation of the books and accounts of such corporations, and for the payment of a reasonable percentage of gross earnings into the treasury of the Philippine Islands or of the Province or municipality within which such franchises are granted and exercised: Provided further, That it shall be unlawful for any corporation organized under this act, or for any person, company, or corporation receiving any grant, franchise, or concession from the government of said islands, to use, employ, or contract for the labor of persons claimed or alleged to be held in involuntary servitude; and any person, company, or corporation so violating the provisions of this act shall forfeit all charters, grants, or franchises for doing business in said islands in an action or proceeding brought for that purpose in any court of competent jurisdiction by any officer of the Philippine Government or on the complaint of any citizen of the Philippines under such regulations and rules as the Philippine Legislature shall prescribe, and in addition shall be deemed guilty of an offense, and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $10,000.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment. I move to strike out, in line 20, page 23, the words "claimed or alleged to be."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 23, line 20, strike out the words "claimed or alleged to be."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know how those words got into the bill. I suppose by inadvertence, but certainly they ought not to be there. The language is:

That it shall be unlawful for any corporation organized under this act, or for any person, company, or corporation receiving any grant, franchise, or concession from the government of said islands, to use, employ, or contract for the labor of persons claimed or alleged to be held in involuntary servitude.

There is no claim that such language ought to be in the bill on the part of the committee. The language will be entirely sufficient if those words are stricken out, so that it will read:

That it shall be unlawful for any corporation organized under this act, or for any person, company, or corporation receiving any grant, franchise, or concession from the government of said islands, to use, employ, or contract for the labor of persons held in involuntary servitude; and any person, company, or corporation—

I do not think, Mr. Chairman, it is necessary to say anything further in support of the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I have any objection to the amendment. I want to say, however, that the words were not inadvertently inserted in the bill, as the gentleman from Iowa seems to think. These words are copied, if I am not mistaken, verbatim from the organic law. I have no objection, however, to the elimination of the words.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I call attention to the proviso in line 15, page 22, which reads, "No private property shall be taken for any purpose under this section," which provides for the taking of property by public quasi corporations exercising the power of eminent domain, "without just compensation paid or tendered therefor."

I think, Mr. Chairman, we should amend this so as to read "taken or damaged." The Constitution of the United States uses the words, in the fifth amendment, "nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." The taking of public property by a corporation exercising the power of eminent domain is a quasi taking for public use, but at the same time in the taking of that property for that use, now known and recognized as a public use, property is very often damaged, and the damage done to the property oftentimes is much more serious and greater than the value of the property so taken.

To illustrate: A railroad comes through your property and, exercising the power of eminent domain, it takes the roadway and pays a just compensation for it, ordinarily its market value. At the same time it may greatly damage the property that they do not take and use. It may run through your orchard or your flower yard; it may cut down a portion of the forest which has been there for years, which your ancestors have planted. They may even invade the place where your dead are buried. They may damage it in many ways, and simply to say that you permit the corporations to pay only for the property they take is not keeping up with the idea that the courts in most of the States of the United States, in considering the question, have decided that the owner of the property ought to be compensated for the damage done to it as well as the value of the property taken.

Mr. TOWNER. Has the gentleman an amendment to offer on that proposition?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have one; yes. I did not want to offer an amendment which would not be acceptable. My amendment is that after the word "taken," in line 15, page 22, insert the words "or damaged," so that it will read: "property shall not be taken or damaged for any purpose under this act without compensation," and so forth.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, it would read "no private property shall be taken or damaged for any purpose under this section."

Mr. BARTLETT. Without just compensation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Shall be taken or damaged?

Mr. BARTLETT. Under this section.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it the construction of the gentleman that this is not broad enough to cover damages?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; it is doubtful whether, under this language, it would cover damages done to the property. I will state to the gentleman that in Georgia we placed in our constitution of 1877 to meet this very question the words proposed to be incorporated in this act.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. We have done the same thing in Missouri. We have inserted the same words because, under the theory that a railroad company has built along a street line its own roadway and prevents access between two portions of a man's land that formerly belonged to the owner, that is a damage; or it can raise a great fill, and only the toe of the fill going on the land with very little actual land taken, but doing very great damage. The same way if a cut was made, there would be a canyon or sunken way between the two portions of the land, and that is a great damage, but not strictly a taking.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that it would be an improvement in the language and, I think, the sense of the amendment if it read this way: "No private property shall be damaged or taken for any purpose," and so forth.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am perfectly willing to accept that. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that that modification be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr Chairman, I trust that this amendment will be agreed to. While in most of the States where the question has arisen injury or damage is held to be included under the taking of the property, still there has been a great deal of litigation regarding that matter. This will settle it and make it plain and clear that if the value is materially impaired, if taken by the Government, it must be paid for.

Mr. JONES. The committee has no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 15, after the word "be," insert the words "damaged or."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling the gentleman's attention to another matter to which I have given some consideration. I refer to the language:

Without just compensation paid or tendered therefor.

I do not think that we should leave it in that shape. Ordinarily where the parties do not agree as to the damage or value to the property taken there is in the States or under the laws of the United States some sort of tribunal to assess the value of the property and the damages. We call them commissioners in our State. That tribunal is to judge the value of the property taken or damaged, and they fix the value. The amount so fixed, the law provides, may be tendered or paid into court, and then the corporation may proceed with its work; but here in this bill you permit the mere tender of an amount not ascertained or agreed upon by anyone except the person who desires to take the property. For instance, a railroad desires to go through the property of some owner of land in the Philippine Islands, and under this bill that railroad company will say, "I do not believe the land to be worth so many dollars, but I will tender you this amount." Who is to determine the value? The landowner declines to take what is tendered to him, but the mere tender of it gives the corporation all of the right that the payment for the property would give it. Therefore I do not think we should, after requiring that just compensation should be paid, which is proper under the Constitution of the United States, say that that requirement of just compensation may be met by a simple tender, without providing at least the means by which just compensation may be ascertained and determined.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to make the observation that simply offering, without any agreement as to what it is worth, would not be a tender, and you would have to have an adjudication in court.

Mr. BARTLETT. Doubtless that would be a proper construction, but you leave it for the corporation itself to determine what amount it will tender, and afterwards leave it to the court to determine whether that is a sufficient amount; but when he tenders the amount, it meets all of the requirements of the act, and they may take the property. The property can be taken in two ways—first, by paying just compensation; and if the owner does not agree that the compensation offered is just, then the corporation may tender what it considers is just, and that answers the requirement.

Mr. FESS. My observation was that if I simply offer you something without any adjudication as to what it is worth, that would not be a tender at all, and it would require an adjudication.

Mr. BARTLETT. You leave it uncertain how the amount is to be determined.

Mr. FESS. You can not do it with the wording as it is here.

Mr. BARTLETT. Exactly; that is the point I am making.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman think that language is broad enough, however, for an organic act or a constitutional provision as a basis of legislative enactments? Does not the gentleman think that provision probably could be made for ascertaining just compensation and how the tender should be made and paid into court and in what period it should be paid? Does the gentleman think it is necessary that all of these details should appear in an organic act?

Mr. BARTLETT. No.

Mr. BORLAND. Where the provision of the organic act is that private property shall not be taken without just compensation, paid or tendered, that constitutional right can be further carried out by proper legislation, and until it is carried out the gentleman knows an injunction would lie against taking any property unless some proceeding had been taken.

Mr. BARTLETT. That may be a proper criticism, and I yield to it as such; but, for one, I do not believe the property ought to be taken until it is paid for. The mere tender is not a payment.

Mr. BORLAND. It is customary now to allow the amount to be paid into court in case the owner will not take the money.

Mr. BARTLETT. A tender is not good unless it is continuing, of course.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman from Georgia that the theory just suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is the theory on which this language was put into the bill. I will say that it struck me at first as peculiar language, but the committee included it upon this theory, that after just compensation had been determined under the forms of law there ought to be some provision whereby these public-utility corporations should not be held up on technicalities if they could go ahead with the work by tendering the money in court.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman think it leaves open a wide field there for litigation to determine what is to be a tender?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. My idea of the proper construction of this language, I will say to the gentleman, is this, that the just compensation must be determined under the forms of law before it can be either paid or tendered. In other words, if they have condemnation proceedings, a jury of view, such as we have in Tennessee—I do not know what the custom is in the gentleman's State——

Mr. BARTLETT. We have what we call commissioners.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. They will have passed upon it or fixed the amount before it can be paid or tendered, unless there shall be a private agreement. Of course the theory is that these public corporations are desirable things to have.

Mr. BARTLETT. Until after you get them; yes. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Upon the theory that they are necessary, that they are public necessities, the committee felt that it was perfectly proper to put these words, "or tendered therefor," in the bill, to the end that they might not be held on technicalities after the just compensation had been determined.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GORDON. The statute in my State provides, in case it is sought to condemn property after a jury has fixed the value upon it in the lower court, that the person seeking to condemn the property deposits the amount fixed by the jury; but that does not, however, destroy the right to review the decision on proceedings in error.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is not intended this should.

Mr. GORDON. Of course our constitution provides, however, that no private property can be taken until it has been paid for.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, I do not understand it is intended that this prevents a review.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. COOPER. Suppose, after the word "compensation," in lines 16 and 17, page 22, you should put "without just compensation lawfully determined, paid or tendered therefor." Suppose you put in the words "first lawfully determined" or "by due process of law"?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Personally, I see no objection to that.

Mr. COOPER. "Lawfully determined" means in accordance with law, and is a better expression.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment in reference to that language.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. First, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to make this observation, or rather to put it in the shape of a question: If the words "or tendered" are eliminated and the language is "just compensation paid," payment necessarily implies acceptance; and if the person whose property is to be taken is paid or accepts compensation, he thereby estops himself from an appeal, no matter how unjust or inadequate he may think the compensation is that the jury or the awarding body has allowed him. So that it is absolutely necessary to have those words "or tendered" in there in order to preserve the rights of the owner of the property, or else you indefinitely delay or postpone the enterprise for which the property is being taken.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is the theory, as the gentleman knows and has well stated, upon which the committee proceeded.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand there is any amendment pending.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I know; but I desire to offer an amendment, if I can get the chance. I move to strike out, in line 17, page 22, the words "paid or tendered therefor."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 22, line 17, by striking out the words "paid or tendered therefor."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, this brings the language of the bill in consonance, as it ought to be, with the language used in the Constitution of the United States and in most of the States. The language used in the Constitution of the United States is simply this:

Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

That language has been construed by the Supreme Court. It has a settled and determined meaning. It has been held to include injuries and damages in the taking of the property, and it would allow every possible benefit that could accrue to the individual that any additional words could give. The difficulty with this language, which has been used in some of the State constitutions, "paid or tendered therefor," is that it is entirely unnecessary. It is meaningless, in the first place, because if the compensation has been paid there is no controversy between the parties. If the United States pays the compensation, there is no question arising, and if the amount is undetermined, it can not be tendered, so that the language is impossible of being made efficacious. It ought to be stricken out in the interest of fairness and in the interest of the people who are being affected thereby.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is it not the usual thing in State constitutions to say "paid or secured"? Because if you simply authorize the taking, without any limitation, you can hold up the building of a railroad, for instance, by litigation that may last for years. In our State we allow a railroad or an improvement of that kind to be constructed if the compensation for the right of way, for instance, is deposited with the clerk of the court where the condemnation proceedings are carried on, so that it will not stop the matter.

Mr. TOWNER. All these matters are and ought to be entirely legislative. Provisions of that character ought to be legislative acts. You can not put in a constitution enough language to cover it. You ought to put in nothing except this bare statement that no property shall be taken without just compensation, just as the Constitution of the United States does. It is impossible to improve upon it, and the provision with regard to the method of paying the ascertained value, the tribunal to which it shall be submitted, and the security that shall be required for the amount ascertained by the tribunal—all of those questions are questions of legislative action, and should be left to the legislature.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

[Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he would agree to an amendment striking out the words "or concession," on page 23, line 18?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HELM. I offer an amendment, on page 23, line 18, by striking out the comma after the word "grant" and inserting the word "or," and strike out the words "or concession."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 18, strike out the comma after the word "grant" and insert the word "or," and strike out the words "or concession" after the word "franchise."

So that it will read:

Person, company, or corporation receiving any grant or franchise from the government of said islands.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman understands that this provision just applies simply to persons held in involuntary servitude or peonage?

Mr. BORLAND. Is there such a thing as concession?

Mr. MILLER. This is the language, I assume, in the organic act, is it not?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think the word "concession" was used, but it was stricken out in this bill.

Mr. MILLER. Of course, the place where the gentleman moves to strike out the word "concession" is a place that is dealing with peonage in the islands.

Mr. HELM. It is a word that has been eliminated from other parts of the bill.

Mr. MILLER. It is to prevent anybody who is receiving a franchise or concession from employing persons who are held against their will.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that he is limiting it.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; the gentleman is excluding one class, and the presumption would be——

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Minnesota is right about it.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, may I be recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "such," in line 14, page 22. It seems to me that leaves a great deal of ambiguity in the language. This is the provision in relation to public property.

Now, as it reads, there is given the authority to authorize the construction of works "across the public property of the United States, including streets, highways, squares, and reservations, and over similar property of the government of said islands, and may adopt rules and regulations under which the provincial and municipal governments of the islands may grant the right to use and occupy such public property belonging to said Provinces or municipalities." Now, if this remains in the bill you have given to the government of the Philippine Islands the power to extend the power of eminent domain over the property of the United States, streets, highways, squares, and reservations belonging to the government, and then you say you give to the municipalities, under regulations to be passed by the legislature, the right to use and occupy such public property. Now, the word "such" there applies to the property of the United States. That is what it says now.

Why not strike out the word "such"? You thereby attain the object you have in view. The word "such" refers back to all the classes of public property, which includes the property of the United States, and by striking it out it will read, "may adopt rules and regulations under which the provincial and municipal governments of the islands may grant the right to use and occupy public property belonging to said Provinces or municipalities." It would clear it up very materially.

Mr. JONES. I see no objection, Mr. Chairman, to the adoption of the language proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota, but if he will look at the organic act he will find that this language is copied verbatim from that act.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. The use of the word "such" would, as the gentleman suggests, limit it to the kinds of public property specified in the section. If you strike out the word "such," it would authorize those municipalities to permit these corporations to use all kinds of public property owned by the municipalities. Do you wish to do that? Do you not wish to limit them to the specific kinds of property owned by the municipalities which are mentioned in the preceding lines of that section? Is not the word "such" used there advisedly? You go over and cross the public property, including streets, highways, squares, and reservations, and over similar property in the islands. But it would not give the municipality the right, if you retained the word "such," to convey to a corporation the right to use an entire public square. They could go across it. I think the word "such" ought to be retained there. I do not think the word "such" ought to be stricken out.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, since reading the language carefully, I rather agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. At least he has convinced me that the word "such" ought to be retained. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] will observe that the language used is this:

That the Government of the Philippine Islands may grant franchises and rights, including the authority to exercise the right of eminent domain, for the construction and operation of works of public utility and service, and may authorize said works to be constructed and maintained over and across the public property of the United States, including streets, highways, squares, and reservations, and over similar property of the government of said islands.

Notice the words, "similar property of the government of said islands." Then the provision continues—

And may adopt rules and regulations under which the provincial and municipal governments of the islands may grant the right to use and occupy such public property belonging to said Provinces or municipalities.

The word "such" evidently refers to the property belonging to the government of the islands, and I think upon further consideration it would be improper to strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, has my time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. MILLER. I would like one moment more.

Mr. JONES. Does not the gentleman from Minnesota think, after examining the language carefully, that the word "such" should be retained? I agreed with the gentleman at first, but a more careful reading of the paragraph convinces me he was mistaken in his construction of its language.

Mr. MILLER. Since the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr COOPER] has called attention to it, I think his comment is a forcible one, but that does not answer the objection made, namely, that the word "such" refers principally to property of the United States. We will grant that there is property of the United States "belonging to said Provinces or municipalities."

Mr. JONES. To make it perfectly clear as to what property is meant, these words are added:

Such property belonging to said Provinces or municipalities.

Taking the two sentences together, there can be no doubt that the property of the islands is that referred to.

Mr. MILLER. It is extremely doubtful language.

Mr. JONES. Since I have read it over carefully, it seems to me it could not be made much plainer.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 15, after the word "exercised," strike out the colon and insert a semicolon and the following language: "No franchise shall be granted for a longer term than 50 years."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the way the act is worded there is no limitation of the term for which the franchise may be granted. Franchises may be granted with reference to any public utility in perpetuity under this bill, and I believe that in view of the experiences we have had here in our cities, our municipalities, our States, and in the country at large we ought to be very glad to establish some safeguard that would limit the term for which a franchise might be granted.

A perpetual franchise runs for a long time, and it seems to me this is one of the most important features in connection with the granting of franchises, how long will they run? We had the other day the question of water power in rivers and on the public domain, and we agreed on a franchise of 50 years there. It seems to me there ought to be some time limited in this bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Is not the gentleman's fear unfounded, in view of the language in lines 21, 22, and 23 that "no franchise or right shall be granted to any corporation except under the conditions that it shall be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal by the Congress of the United States"?

Mr. BRYAN. If we give them their independence, suppose a franchise is granted in perpetuity after this law takes effect. Five years from now the Democrats will prevail on the Republicans or somebody else to give them their independence, which they say ought to be given them in this preamble; how will Congress revoke that franchise?

Mr. BORLAND. If they have their independence, they will succeed to the sovereignty and exercise all of the right of sovereignty, and could not they repeal the charter?

Mr. BRYAN. Perhaps so; but that is unsatisfactory. The United States is going to keep the Philippine Islands until all of us are dead; there is no question about that. Congress is going to have this authority and power for a very long time. No one is going to consent to the ridiculous proposition of quitting the Pacific Ocean. The suggestion that Congress has the right to repeal is inadequate, and I think the franchise ought to be limited. Does anyone here suppose Congress is going to take up a Philippine franchise after it has been running for a number of years and repeal it, except for the grossest and most unusual abuse? Let us fix a limit.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I think the questions asked by the gentleman from Missouri sufficiently answer the argument of the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr JONES. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Suppose that a large number of franchises are granted over there in perpetuity by the Philippine Legislature. The Sugar Trust now has 55,000 acres of land in Mindoro. It was not intended by Congress that any corporation should have the right to purchase more than 2,500 acres of agricultural land in the islands, which, acre for acre, is three times as productive as ours. But that company has 55,000 acres. If we give the Philippine Government power to grant perpetual franchises, how many corporations will secure gigantic concessions, and when the Government of the United States undertakes to hand over the Philippines—should it ever do so—demand that their rights be protected by express provisions in the articles of cession?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman asks a question which I do not think has any application to the subject under discussion. The sale of those lands was not the grant of a franchise. It was a sale made by the Philippine Government under a section of the organic law which provides for the sale of the public lands, and limits the amount to be sold to an individual or corporation. The commission decided that the restrictions placed upon the sales of the public domain acquired from Spain did not apply to the friar lands which were acquired by purchase, and authorized the sale of those lands in quantities in excess of 1,040 hectares. The gentleman from Wisconsin thought, and I thoroughly agreed with him, that the commission violated the law in making such sales. But I do not think that there is any connection between those illegal sales and a provision which relates to the granting of franchises.

Mr. COOPER. No; but corporations of that kind might be able to get all sorts of concessions and franchises.

Mr. JONES. If they do get them, Congress can annul them; and if Congress does not do it before the Philippines get their independence, as the gentleman from Missouri has well said, the Philippine Government will succeed to all the attributes of the sovereignty of the United States, including the right to annul franchises.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Virginia and I agree on the proposition that the sale of 55,000 acres of land to the Sugar Trust, or to any other single purchaser, was in direct violation of the whole spirit and intent of Congress and of the law. To prove that our contention is correct I refer to the fact that the Secretary of War, Mr. Taft, in a speech, in 1905, before the Commercial Club of Kansas City, an excerpt from which speech I put into the RECORD in July, 1912, expressly informed that club—I have a verbatim printed copy of the speech—that Congress had by the act of 1902 limited the amount of lands which any corporation could own over there to 2,500 acres, and that therefore there was no danger of exploitation by gigantic corporations. And yet afterwards 55,000 acres of land were sold to the agent of one corporation—the American Sugar Trust.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER. They were first refused the right to buy so large a tract, and were told at the War Department, in the office of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, that Congress had by the act of 1902 prohibited any corporation from buying more than 2,500 acres.

Mr. MILLER. Was the prohibition in the act of 1902 confined to the public domain?

Mr. COOPER. It was not by any reasonable construction of the law.

Mr. MILLER. Can the gentleman point out in the organic act any place where it says that the friar lands only to the extent of that amount of acreage could be sold to one individual or corporation?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman I have to say that I introduced the bill and reported it to the House from the Committee on Insular Affairs, and that I always understood, as did everybody else, that the bill and the law it became applied to all of the public lands in the Philippine Archipelago. It is preposterous to suppose that the Congress of the United States intended to give to any single corporation or individual the right to buy 55 000 acres of those enormously productive lands. To say that Congress intended to allow such a thing is to say that Congress intended to put no restriction whatever on the amount of land that a corporation could buy, but deliberately permit any corporation, if it so desired, to buy all of the public lands in the islands.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I wish to say in reply to the remark of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] that I regret that this discussion has been entered upon.

Mr. MILLER. I did not enter upon it.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman asked the gentleman from Wisconsin if he could point to a single line of the organic law which forbids the sale of friar lands in excess of 1,040 hectares, and I desire to call his attention to this. If he will refer to sections 63, 64, and 65 of the organic law, under which these friar lands were purchased, and will examine section 65, he will find this language:

All lands acquired by virtue of the preceding section shall constitute a part and portion of the public property of the Government of the Philippine Islands, and may be held, sold or conveyed, or leased temporarily for a period not exceeding three years after their acquisition by said Government, on such terms and conditions as it may prescribe, subject to the limitations and conditions provided for in this act.

This is the provision of law which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] thinks forbids the sale of the friar lands in larger quantities than the lands acquired from Spain can be sold.

Mr. MILLER. Can the gentleman from Virginia inform the committee whether or not the Attorney General of the United States construed this paragraph; and if he did, what did he hold?

Mr. JONES. I will reply to the gentleman's question if he will give me his attention.

Mr. MILLER. I am listening.

Mr. JONES. The then Attorney General did give an opinion—a very brief and hastily prepared one—to the effect that there was no limitation upon the quantity of the friar lands which could be disposed of. Subsequently there was a congressional investigation as to these sales when this opinion was called in question. I was told then that the Attorney General said that if he had known the question was "loaded" he would have given the subject more careful consideration. At any rate, it bore intrinsic evidence of hasty preparation, and was never, I think, given any serious consideration by any good lawyer.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman to say that in that opinion, or in an article in a newspaper or magazine, the Attorney General took occasion to say, in effect, that manifestly it was the intent of Congress to authorize such a transaction as that 55,000-acre purchase. I was the chairman of the committee that reported the bill, and I know that he utterly misstated the intent of Congress.

Mr. JONES. May I not ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin have two minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I certainly do not want to enter into any controversy over this question. It has no bearing on the bill.

Mr. JONES. I do not think it has either; but it has nevertheless been dragged in.

Mr. MILLER. I have not raised the subject, and it seems to me that if we are going into it we ought to go into it thoroughly. There is a great deal that can be said upon both sides, and it is not fair to have this continue on indefinitely with only one side presented, and yet I do not feel disposed, and I do not think anybody else does, to enter into a discussion of it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may have two minutes and that the gentleman from Minnesota may have five minutes.

Mr. MILLER. I do not care for any time, because I am not going to get into any controversy over the matter.

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask the gentleman one question before he proceeds, if he does not object——

Mr. COOPER. I think I would like about three minutes. I want to read what Secretary Taft said.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman can put it in the RECORD.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to read it here, because I think it of great importance at this point.

Mr. MILLER. I think its presentation in the way it is being done is not fair.

Mr. COOPER. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota who inquired if a word could be cited to show the intent of Congress was——

Mr. MILLER. I have no——

Mr. COOPER. I wish to put it in in such a way that it will not permit even the gentleman from Minnesota to dispute as to the true intent of the law.

Mr. MILLER. I am not disputing it. I am not entering into any controversy about it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may have three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question? Is it not true that, notwithstanding the opinion of the Attorney General, to which reference has been made, the Taft administration directed that no more friar lands should be sold in quantities in excess of 2,500 acres, or 1,040 hectares? That is a fact, and none has been sold since then in larger quantities.

Mr. COOPER. On November 20, 1905, three years after Congress enacted the organic act of 1902, Mr. Secretary of War Taft made a speech to the Commercial Club of Kansas City, Mo. I had an advance press copy of that speech, and will now read what the Secretary said on that occasion as to the law limiting the amount of land which could be sold to a corporation in the Philippine Islands:

> Gentlemen of the Commercial Club of Kansas City, we have purchased from the ecclesiastical orders 400,000 acres of the best land in the islands for the purpose of distributing it in small parcels among the tenants, to be paid for in long and easy payments.

Of course, tenants did not occupy all that land, as he well knew. Now, Mr. Chairman, is it to be supposed that the man who made that statement had a secret belief which he deliberately concealed from his audience, that 55,000 acres of those lands could lawfully be sold to one person or, indeed, that the whole 242,000 vacant acres could be lumped off to one man?

But that distinguished gentleman said something else of great importance in that speech which shows conclusively what he thought Congress had done by the law of 1902:

> Much is made of the probable investment of American capital in sugar and sugar machinery. In the first place, by the laws of the Philippines enacted by Congress, no corporation can take up or hold more than 2,500 acres of land. This is prohibitory, so far as new investments in sugar plantations are concerned, because the sugar that can be produced from such a tract would not justify the investment of the amount needed for a modern sugar plant.

Mr. Secretary Taft told the Commercial Club of Kansas City that Congress had made exploitation impossible, because the law of 1902, by express enactment, limited the amount of land which could be purchased by a corporation in the Philippines to 2,500 acres.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Nobody ever thought of a 55,000-acre purchase until the Attorney General said that the representative of the Havemeyer Sugar Trust should be allowed to purchase 55,000 acres, and he bought it. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to enter into any controversy over this matter. I think the injection of this item at this time by the gentleman from Wisconsin was very ill advised. It is something that should not occupy the time of this committee at this moment, but he has injected it, and, without any desire to enter into a full discussion of it, I think it is only fair to these people to say something. I am reliably informed—and when I say reliably I mean it—that it is the intention of the parties who acquired this land to dispose of it in a great many small quantities to the Filipino people for them to own, occupy, and enjoy. And I ask the gentleman from the Philippines [Señor QUEZON] if that statement is not correct?

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I can say to the committee that I have the same assurance.

Mr. MILLER. So that this institution, which has thus been maligned, as a matter of fact has developed or is developing a large area of wild country in a region where wild people live—the Mangyans—and anybody who knows about this wild people knows the extent of their wildness. This company has already brought 4,000 good Christian Filipino people there, are giving them homes, and they are in process, after having developed and cultivated the land, of selling it and disposing of it as permanent homes for these people. The only benefit that will result to the business association is that the sugar that will be grown upon these lands will be crushed in the mill there to be constructed.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a lot of loose talk about this company and this estate. Doubtless the talk is sincere, but it is grossly mistaken. The facts assumed are erroneous; the conclusions drawn are therefore incorrect. I know whereof I speak when I say that if the gentleman will introduce a resolution providing for the return of this whole estate and all the improvements made thereon, and repaying the company all they have invested in the estate, that company will beg and pray for the passage of the resolution.

Mindoro, where this company is developing these wild lands, has long been known as the white man's grave and the brown man's tomb. Those miasmic areas are filled with malaria of a deadly kind. It has baffled medicine. This company which the gentleman condemns has expended $100,000 in medical research and has found a means to combat the pestilence. Their contribution to humanity has been great and immediate.

They have constructed a splendid deep-water dock which any boat can use. They are transforming these thousands of acres of cogon grass and jungle into wonderfully fertile and productive areas. They are preparing to sell this to individual Filipinos for them always to enjoy.

The gentleman greatly mistakes the Filipino opinion of this company. The commission, now composed of a majority of Filipinos, recently voted, at the request of a Filipino member, a very substantial governmental aid to the company, it having reached severe financial straits.

Before making such accusations and insinuations, the gentleman should advise himself of the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washingon [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Had we not better have that reported? Perhaps the gentlemen do not know that we are voting on the limitation of a term of franchise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, that instead of the words "50 years" the words "in perpetuity" be inserted, so that it will read "that no franchise shall be granted in perpetuity." See if we can not cut out perpetual franchise in a Democratic House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 15, after the word "exercised," strike out the colon and insert a semicolon and the following language: "No franchise shall be granted in perpetuity."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, to say that no franchise shall be granted in perpetuity would not be very much of a limitation, because under those words "in perpetuity" a lease could be made for 999 years, and that is considerable of a while. It is not "in perpetuity," but it is a long time.

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman will yield. I will say that I was trying to establish a time limit that will suit a Democratic majority here. I was trying to get 50 years adopted. If somebody will amend and make it 100 years, that will be an improvement on my last amendment, and I will support the change. But I submit that if we can prevent the rights of the people being given away in the form of perpetual franchises we will accomplish something. The very fact that the legislature will have to fix a definite term will put them on their guard. To give a light company or a water company or a gas company a perpetual franchise is a crime against the living and against the generations yet to come.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a new section to come right in there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers a new section, which the Clerk will report.

Insert as a new section, 26a, the following:

"The sale, manufacture for sale, transportation for sale, importation for sale, and exportation for sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes in the Philippine Islands and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof are forever prohibited. The Philippine Legislature shall have power to provide for the manufacture, sale, importation, and transportation of intoxicating liquors for sacramental, medicinal, mechanical, pharmaceutical, or scientific purposes, or for use in the arts, and shall have power to enforce this article by all needful legislation."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that the amendment is not germane to the section under consideration.

Mr. BRYAN. I will state to the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. Permit me, if the gentleman please——

Mr. BRYAN. I was going to tell you it was a new section.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will not. I make the point of order that the provision restricting the legislation was a prior section, and it should have been inserted there, where it might have been in order. It certainly is not in order at this place, which relates to franchises and not to the limitation of the legislature.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, there is likely to be quite a discussion on this point of order unless the Chair is ready to rule at once, and I therefore make the point that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, no. I trust the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. BRYAN. I think this ought to go over for a day or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. BRYAN. I was going to make the point after the Chair had ruled, anyway.

Mr. MILLER. There is another amendment to the paragraph that I want the Resident Commissioner from the Philippines to speak upon, as the gentleman wishes to leave to-night.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this amendment I have just offered shall go over until our next convening.

Mr. MILLER. Withdraw it until after the reading and consideration of the next paragraph. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the consideration of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] be postponed until after we have completed the consideration of section 27.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] shall be deferred until the conclusion of the reading of section 27. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if it is the intention of the chairman of the committee to complete the reading of this bill to-night?

Mr. JONES. I did not catch the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. MOORE. I have reserved the right to object in order that I might ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] whether he intends to press for the reading of the bill to a finality to-night?

Mr. JONES. No. I would like to have the Clerk read through the governmental provisions. We are now nearly through them. The preamble will take some time to discuss, and gentlemen will want time, and I shall not press it.

Mr. MOORE. We can go on with the consideration of the bill to-morrow?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. The gentleman would not agree to my unanimous-consent request.

Mr. JONES. What was it?

Mr. BRYAN. I asked unanimous consent that the further consideration of this amendment go over until the next time this committee meets.

Mr. MILLER. I thought I was making just exactly the request that the gentleman wanted.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask that the request be submitted. Mr. Chairman, that the further consideration of the amendment that I have offered go over until this committee meets again—to-morrow or next day.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman might state it this way and accomplish his purpose—to go over until we have completed the reading of the governmental provisions of the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. We are not going to complete the bill to-day?

Mr. JONES. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the consideration of his amendment go over until the next day when this bill is considered——

Mr. STAFFORD. With the point of order pending?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That, except as in this act otherwise provided, the salaries of all the officials of the Philippines not appointed by the President, including deputies assistants, and other help, shall be such and be so paid out of the revenues of the Philippines as shall from time to time be determined by the Philippine Legislature and approved by the Governor General; and if the legislature shall fail to make an appropriation for such salaries, the salaries so fixed shall be paid without the necessity of further appropriations therefor. The salaries of all officers and all expenses of the offices of the various officials of the Philippines appointed as herein provided by the President shall also be paid out of the revenues of the Philippines. The annual salaries of the following-named officials appointed by the President and so to be paid shall be: The Governor General, $18,000; in addition thereto he shall be entitled to the occupancy of the buildings heretofore used by the chief executive of the Philippines, with the furniture and effects therein, free of rental; chief justice of the supreme court, $10,500; associate justices of the supreme court, $10,000 each.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 20, page 24, the figures "$18,000" and substitute in lieu thereof the figures "$25,000." I would like to be heard, Mr. Chairman, for just a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 20, strike out the figures "$18,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$25,000."

Mr. MILLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, unless this amendment is adopted, or one substantially increasing the amount named in the bill, the Governor Generalship in the Philippine Islands must in future go to a rich man.

It is unquestioned that $18,000 will not pay the expenses of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands. I assume, and I believe I assume correctly, that the membership of the committee want to respond to the wishes of the Filipino people as far as possible, especially in a matter where Filipino people are going to pay the bill. Now, if the Filipino people desire that their Governor General shall have a salary of $25,000, which they themselves pay, in order that he may occupy the position required by the importance of his office, it seems to me we ought to grant their request.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. QUEZON. I would like to make the statement, Mr. Chairman, in connection with what the gentleman from Minnesota is saying, that the Philippine Assembly, at the last session of the Philippine Legislature, while it tried to reduce, and did reduce, the salary of almost every high-salaried official of the Philippine Government, it did not wish to reduce the salary of the Governor General. In fact, there were some members who thought it should be increased to $25,000, because the people of the Philippine Islands realize the heavy burdens of the position. I have just received a cablegram from the speaker of the assembly making some suggestions regarding this bill, and one of these suggestions is in line with the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER. That is a cablegram from the speaker of the assembly to the effect that the Filipinos would like to have this salary increased to $25,000?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER. Gentlemen, it is of the utmost importance, I think, that this amount be increased as requested by the people of the Philippines. The Governor General is to occupy the Malacanan Palace, left by the Spanish Government. He can not occupy it in a decent way on the sum named here. Now, the Filipino people desire that he occupy a place commensurate with the dignity of his office, and they are glad and willing to pay this amount, and they ask Congress to increase it.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to make a further statement?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. QUEZON. I would like to say that the salary of the Governor General has been reduced by the legislature at the insistence of Gov. Harrison himself.

Mr. MILLER. Yes. The Governor General thought that inasmuch as other salaries were being reduced, he would reduce his own. Now, we all know that the salary of the Governor General is not of prime importance to him for he is a wealthy man.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the present salary?

Mr. MILLER. Eighteen thousand dollars. Heretofore it was $21,000.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would it be satisfactory, instead of adopting an arbitrary sum, to insert a provision that it shall not be less than the following sum, so as to leave the amounts as they stand in the bill and still leave it to the Philippine Legislature?

Mr. MILLER. I do not think that change would make any difference. They can do that now.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think they could under the terms of this bill for we fix it arbitrarily. If the gentleman would accept that proposition, I think we could compromise the matter.

Mr. MILLER. Well, I would be willing to accept that.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. QUEZON. I wish the gentleman would withhold that long enough for me to address the committee for a few minutes.

Mr. MOORE. Very well, Mr. Chairman; I will withdraw it for the present.

[Mr. QUEZON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman be willing to withhold his point until we can dispose with this amendment? I will say to the gentleman that these other gentlemen have agreed among themselves, and there will be no discussion of it.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that there are other amendments to be offered and it would take at least an hour to finish this paragraph, if we open it up again, and we will be no better off than we were 10 minutes ago. I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ADAIR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18459 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HOWELL, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. WATSON, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

FREDERICK H. LEMLY.

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (S. 3561) to appoint Frederick H. Lemly a passed assistant paymaster on the active list of the United States Navy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, it is rather late in the day to consider that kind of a bill. The gentleman can bring it up to-morrow or the next day.

Mr. STEDMAN. It is a case of extraordinary merit.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would first have to examine the bill before I could give my consent to it, and I can not do it at this late hour. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his request and submit it to-morrow or next day.

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order to-morrow under the rule shall be in order on Thursday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks unanimous consent that business that would be in order to-morrow, Calendar Wednesday, be transferred or postponed until Thursday. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does that mean that Thursday shall be Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. HENRY. Then I believe the Committee on Printing has a bill up for consideration, which will be the regular order?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. HENRY. Under the circumstances, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on denatured alcohol as a source of power on the farm.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of woman suffrage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman on what side he is?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am in favor of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of a matter that has come up in the Pension Office.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY. Reserving the right to object, what is the subject?

Mr. PLATT. A matter that has come up in the Pension Office.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I want to couple with that a request that I be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of cotton. If that is done, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of pensions, and the gentleman from Texas couples to that a request that he be permitted to extend his remarks on the subject of cotton. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, to-day this side has raised no objection to two or three requests for unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD made on the other side. Here is the first occasion that any Member upon this side has made that request——

Mr. CRISP. Oh, no; consent was just this moment granted to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order. Shoot, Luke, or give up the gun!

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if I may be allowed to do so——

Mr. HENRY. I shall object, unless I can say something.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded and the regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I do object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is objecting to his own request.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I thought the Speaker was putting the other request. I shall not object to my own request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this double-headed request?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, if I can not reserve the right to object, I shall have to object. I wanted to accommodate the gentleman——

Mr. HENRY. I am sorry the gentleman is objecting to any pension matter.

Mr. PAYNE. I wanted to accommodate the gentleman from Texas, but the gentleman from Connecticut will not let me——

Mr. HENRY. I am sorry the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Connecticut see proper to object to pension matters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not object to the pension request, if that is the only request.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the other request?

Mr. PAYNE. I do, unless I can have a chance to say a word.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT]?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, is my request coupled with it?

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman's request is knocked out.

Mr. HENRY. Who knocked it out?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. HENRY. Then I would have to knock out his request; and I do object.

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from New York, Mr. PLATT, did not object, but it was the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAYNE, who objected.

Mr. HENRY. It is as broad as it is long, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a speech delivered by my colleague, Mr. WINSLOW, at a Republican convention in Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered by his colleague [Mr. WINSLOW] at a Republican convention.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will couple my request with that and ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to print some remarks on cotton.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman think it is fair from his standpoint, after consents have been granted to Members on his side, to couple up such a request?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman can not amend a request of that kind. It must be put separately. I think the gentleman is entitled to have his request put separately.

Mr. HENRY. I have another way of amending it, and I object.

Mr. PAYNE. All right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Wednesday, October 14, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SUMMARY.

Additional tax on fermented liquors and tax on rectified spirits and wines	57,015,000
Special taxes on bankers and brokers	4,812,000
Theaters, circuses, bowling alleys, billiard and pool rooms, and commission merchants	2,140,000
Dealers in and manufacturers of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes	5,318,000
Schedule A	30,990,000
Sleeping car and parlor car	125,000
Schedule B	7,000,000
Grand total	107,400,000

The foregoing estimate includes an estimate of additional tax on fermented liquor based upon the quantity tax paid during the fiscal year 1914. During the months of July and August last the decrease in the quantity of fermented liquor tax paid as compared with the same months in the previous year was 1,494,393 barrels. If the same ratio of decrease continues, the additional revenue from this source for a year would be $14,901,714 less than is shown on a basis of the fiscal year 1914 tax payments. It will thus be seen that on a basis of the quantity of fermented liquor tax paid during July and August, 1914, the estimate of the revenue that will be raised by the bill will be $92,498,286 instead of $107,400,000.

Respectfully,

W. G. McADOO, Secretary.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, pursuant to a notice which I gave yesterday I desire to submit a few remarks on the pending bill, but I will yield to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask leave to print in the RECORD an article by Mr. A. S. Terrill, chairman of the United States Lumber & Cotton Co., of Chicago, on the subject of handling cotton. This subject will be before the Senate tomorrow and I think it would be of value to Senators if this article, not a very long one, should be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT AID IN HANDLING COTTON.

[By A. S. Terrill, chairman, United States Lumber & Cotton Co., Chicago.]

Unless the planters secure speedy financial assistance, the South will suffer irreparable loss, but if they can be assisted to carry the crop until the end of the war, or until conditions materially improve, they will realize good remunerative prices.

For the past 12 years I have been interested in large cotton planting operations, and during that period have spent much of my time in the South.

My business affairs also have required my presence at our English office at intervals, for extended periods of time, upon matters connected with the cotton industry, and I have just returned from a six months' stay abroad, consequently I have been in close touch with the cotton spinners of Europe, and have for several years attended many of the meetings of the International Federation of Master Cotton Spinners & Manufacturers' Associations as a guest of honor from the United States. As such I had the pleasure of being the sole guest of honor at the meeting of their executive committee, received by President Poincaire in Paris last June.

As a result of my connection with the industry, and my close association, both with the growers of the raw product and large manufacturers of the finished goods in Europe and America, I have had unusual opportunities for studying the industry from all points of view, and thoroughly familiarizing myself with all its different phases and ramifications.

Ever since my first connection with cotton planting I have watched with keen interest the unceasing efforts of the people of the South to develop their country, exploit its natural resources, and add to its material prosperity. I have had some small part in this work myself. I believe through my efforts some $30,000,000 of foreign and northern capital has been invested in southern enterprises.

At the close of the war of the sixties the South found itself with its credit seriously impaired, verging on the stage of bankruptcy, and drained of money and men. Since then its people have been engaged in a tremendous struggle for economic success and the creation of a prosperous agricultural and industrial section. In their undertakings they have labored under great handicaps. In recent years their efforts have been commencing to bear fruit, and they have beheld the dawn of a new era of prosperity. Now the blight of war has fallen upon them and the sanguinary struggle in Europe has deprived them temporarily of a foreign market for their cotton—America's greatest export crop.

According to the United States Census Bureau's report, the South produced in 1913 14,315,015 bales of cotton, which, together with the cotton seed, was valued at over a billion dollars. Some conception of the gigantic size of the crop is gained when it is noted that its value exceeded the world's output of gold and silver for the year 1913 by $400,000,000. Of the total crop, only 42 per cent was consumed by home manufacturers, the remainder having been exported to Europe, England taking more than any other country. The cotton crop of this year will be fully as large, in all probability larger than that of last year. As a result of the European war, with its consequent business stagnation and paralysis of industry, the European manufacturers will be unable to consume that quantity of cotton this year, thus depriving the southern planters of a market for about 58 per cent of their crop. This situation is, however, but temporary and will last only while the war is in progress. As soon as peace is declared and business abroad resumes its normal course, the demand for cotton and the prices obtainable will inevitably exceed those prevailing in normal years. Were there adequate means for the storage of the crop and were cotton planting established upon a firmer financial basis, the crisis might not be so acute. Moreover, the situation is further complicated by the inadequate methods of financing the crop during the growing period. In the past, bankers in the North have not taken a great interest in this matter; they have rather left it to the South, where money is scarce and high rates of interest prevail. It has been customary for the country merchant or banker to furnish the requisite supplies and money attendant upon the production of the crop until its harvesting, and for the planter to rely upon the quick sale of his cotton to meet his obligations, reimbursing his banker or merchant as he sells his crop, the security for such loans not being such as would be discounted by the Federal reserve banks.

The condition, then, confronting the cotton planter at the present time is such that if, upon the harvesting of his crop in the near future, he is required to meet his pressing obligations, he will be forced to sell his cotton at a price in many instances less than the amount that it cost him to produce it. The results of this would be that the South, which has been making such rapid strides in economic developments in recent years, would suffer an irreparable setback, and the cotton-growing industry would dwindle to such quantities as would be insufficient to meet our home demands. The situation, then, is most serious. Its gravity can not be overestimated.

Bearing in mind that loss of the European market is but temporary, it is readily seen that what is needed is the devising of some means whereby the cotton planters may secure relief from their creditors, enabled to store their crop, and reap the benefit of the increased market that the close of the war will bring. Private efforts have proved unavailing for the proper financing of the crop. It is then imperative that the Federal Government extend aid to cotton growers at this time. It occurs to me that the situation can be relieved if the Federal Government will act along the following lines:

1. The Government of the United States should temporarily inaugurate a system of examination and certification of cotton by a corps of district inspectors, whose duty it should be to stamp every bale as to quality and grade.

2. The Government should designate warehouses suitable for the storage of cotton; such warehouses might be temporarily under Government control.

3. The Government should provide for the issuance of receipts to the owners of cotton, stating the number of pounds they have stored in the warehouse.

4. The Government should arrange with banks to loan, at a fixed rate of interest, given amounts per pound of each grade of cotton upon these warehouse receipts as security.

By this means the planter would be equipped with security upon which he could borrow the funds requisite to enable him to carry the crop through the duration of the war, and the banker, in turn, would be enabled to make loans upon security which would be backed by governmental certification. The advances upon these receipts need not be in excess of 75 per cent of the actual value or the market price upon the day of advance, the planter carrying the difference himself and obtaining whatever profit there may be in holding his cotton.

The creation of cotton-warehouse receipts that will serve as negotiable securities is really no new and radical departure. It has long been customary for bankers to advance funds on corn, wheat, and other grains deposited in elevators. Why not provide for loans on cotton properly inspected, especially when such action will avert the disaster that is threatening the South? Why not extend to cotton the privileges granted other agricultural products under similar conditions?

For the United States Government to extend aid at this time is no more than European Governments have been doing. They have long realized the necessity of furnishing a stimulus for the culture of cotton. At these international conferences of which I have spoken I have heard many able men propose that their Governments furnish money for the development of cotton growing in their colonial possessions. In fact, it was in accordance with the opinions expressed at one of these conferences at The Hague, which I had the pleasure of attending, that the British Government passed a law appropriating £3,000,000 ($15,000,000) to promote the growing of cotton in the Sudan. Several millions have been spent by the British cotton-growing associations in experimenting in the English colonies on cotton culture, and there are gigantic efforts being made to produce Indian cotton in large quantities. I am informed by the secretary of the International Federation of Master Cotton Spinners & Manufacturers' Associations that the growth of Indian cotton is increasing at the rate of about 500,000 bales a year. In view of these efforts to stimulate cotton culture upon the part of European countries—efforts which will undoubtedly be renewed upon the close of the war—it is all the more essential that every care be taken by the United States to prevent any serious calamity striking the industry in this country.

The need of preventing any injury to our cotton crop is fully appreciated in England, and English cotton manufacturers are a unit in desiring that steps be taken looking toward the relief of the present situation. For example, upon the eve of my departure from England, Sir Charles Macara, president of the International Federation of Master Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Association, had the secretary of the organization meet me at Liverpool and most urgently request me to urge the adoption of some means of relief for the cotton planters. Further, Sir Charles Macara wrote me a few days ago a letter under date of August 31, of which the following are extracts:

"The purpose of this letter is to confirm to you the statement made by our secretary on Saturday that it would be a great calamity if, owing to the European war, the cotton farmers of the United States of America were ruined. Their ruin will certainly be brought about unless steps are taken by the Government of the United States of America, in combination with large financial houses, to hold back several million bales of cotton. It must be borne in mind that if the war lasts longer than the end of this year there will be a surplus of American cotton of some 5,000,000 bales, and this must necessarily have a depreciating effect on the price of American cotton, and the producer will necessarily be the greatest sufferer in the end. It is neither to the interests of the cotton spinners of the world nor to that of the United States of America, as a Nation, that the price of cotton be reduced to such a low level as, say, 6 or 8 cents.

"I recognize more fully than perhaps anyone else the very serious situation, having—in consequence of my various public positions, and especially as president of the International Cotton Federation—been obliged to give a very close study and attention to the question of the cotton supply. On the occasion of the tour of 120 cotton spinners and manufacturers of all nationalities, which I led in 1907 through the cotton-growing States of America, it became evident to me that in years of exceptionally large cotton crops it would be in the interests of the millions of cotton producers and cotton-mill operatives that a scheme for properly packing and warehousing the surplus cotton crop should be initiated, and in view of the certainty that there will be an enormous surplus in this year's American cotton crop, such a scheme undertaken by the Government of the United States of America would be a safeguard against dire calamity.

"I trust you will submit this letter to President Wilson, who, I am sure, will share my opinion."

Sir Charles Macara, the writer of this letter, is considered the highest authority in England on the cotton industry, and his opinions are there regarded as the last word upon the subject. He has spent a lifetime in connection with the cotton industry, and is thoroughly acquainted with all the various stages of the evolution of the cotton seed into the cotton fabric.

We are confronted with a crying need; a situation is at hand imperiling the prosperity of a great section of this country. The means of relief are present. The Government has the power, it has the funds, it can render this aid without fear or loss or disaster to itself, and with the realization that it is conferring inestimable benefits upon the South and saving a great industry from jeopardy. Let us not delay; let a committee of broad-minded, careful business men be formed at once to cooperate with the Federal Reserve Board in the formulation of a plan of relief.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the New York American of October 13 in regard to the cotton situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NO ADJOURNMENT FOR CONGRESS WITHOUT COTTON LEGISLATION.

Senator OVERMAN yesterday announced to the Senate that he would oppose the enactment or consideration of any further legislation until some action had been taken by Congress for the relief of the cotton situation in the South.

"I want to say," said the Senator, "that there will be no unanimous consent to a vote on this bill or to hasten adjournment unless something is done about the cotton situation. Some of us are working on an amendment to this war-tax bill which we believe will tend to relieve the South. I shall object to any unanimous consent to vote until that amendment is disposed of."

This is the first voice raised in sturdy assertion of the need for swift and effective action by Congress to dispel the financial clouds which, gathering in the South, are likely to sweep over the whole Nation.

For it is utter folly for anyone, or for any section, to imagine that the second crop of the United States, a crop representing in normal times $800,000,000, can be made unsalable and its producers reduced to beggary without the most disastrous results to business in every other part of the land.

The peril is a national one and the National Congress must be looked to to avert it.

But what has this National Congress been doing? The House last week spent its time in debating the futile and unnecessary Philippine bill. Friday it spent an hour or more listening to the leader of the minority, Mr. MANN, and an Alabama Representative, Mr. HEFLIN, exchange bitter and abusive personalities over the question of which of them had the more grossly insulted the advocates of woman suffrage by his utterances in the House. Nero fiddling over burning Rome furnishes an historic parallel to Congress loafing along, and quarreling over personal matters, while day after day the fetters of a financial stringency are being the more tightly fastened upon the cotton producers of the South.

Senator OVERMAN has done well to sound the note of defiance to those who are seeking to avoid any cotton legislation. In no more honorable purpose could a filibuster be employed than in compelling an unwilling Congress to give attention to this vital problem, and to solve it if human ingenuity can obtain a solution.

It is perfectly apparent that the administration as a force is covertly hostile to any action favoring the cotton planters. It has been prolific of soft words, but utterly unproductive of political results. A President who has never yet failed to force through Congress the legislation he desired is either incapable of formulating a measure which will meet this need or unwilling to use his great power to compel congressional action to this end. He could make the Panama Canal useless as a competitor to the transcontinental railroads and futile as an agency in building up the American merchant marine, but when it comes to saving from complete disaster the producers of one of America's greatest export staples he loses his fertility of resource and fails to employ his political power over legislation.

It can not be too strongly emphasized that the cotton situation is not a local but a national menace; that the need for its correction is immediate, and that the agency for its correction is the United States Government, acting through Congress. It is a pity that the rules of the House do not permit some such drastic action to be taken there as Senator OVERMAN has taken in the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have a letter here in the form of a memorial, signed by a great number of druggists in Michigan, which I desire to have printed in the RECORD, together with the names, which are about 15 or 20.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, with the signatures attached, as follows:

ANN ARBOR, MICH., October 10, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We take note of the report that Congress is on the point of introducing and passing bills for the purpose of raising revenue. We also understand that, as in the past, the tendency is to shift more than his reasonable share on the millionaire druggist (?) as an easy mark and along the line of least resistance.

We have no objections to offer when an extra revenue tax is placed on articles considered as a luxury, as perfumes, toilet articles of all kinds, grape juice (Bryan's), cigars, and others not absolutely necessary for a comfortable existence. This country is not at war. There is no reason for an extraordinary tax. The tendency in all our history of legislation for raising special revenue has been to make medicinal drugs and medicinal preparations a most desirable object. Why, is a conundrum for me. It certainly does not conform with a true American spirit and principle of generosity and the keen sympathy displayed in misfortunes of their fellow citizens or others.

If anyone should be exempt from special tax, it is the sick, the individual having the misfortune of being unable to earn. Does it look reasonable that a person put in a condition by sickness, making the person incompetent to earn—to tax one for being sick?

To show you how unreasonable and how unjust a special revenue tax on proprietary remedies is to the retail druggist we will take, for example, the conditions brought on by the special tax in the Spanish War. The tax levied on a proprietary remedy was added to the price by the owner, but not satisfied with adding actual tax, the opportunity was seized to boost the existing jobbing price. As, for instance, proprietaries listed prior to the tax levy at $8 and $9 per dozen and retailed at $1 per package, which demanded a tax of 30 cents per dozen, were raised to $8.50 and $9.50, respectively. This resulted in an actual tax of 50 cents per dozen to the retailer. The proprietary owner got back the tax paid the Government and even made a good investment bearing interest at the rate of 66⅔ per cent. But how about the retailer in this deal? It was practically absolutely out of the question to attempt to collect the paid-out tax from the consumer, thus placing the whole tax, which should have been borne by the entire population, on the shoulders of a small per cent set aside as a class for themselves.

If such a stamp tax is passed as contemplated, it will be a gross injustice and the most detestable form of the so-much-criticized class legislation.

Respectfully submitted to your consideration by—

U. A. Goulding, L. A. Wikel, O. L. Alward, Sugden Drug Co. (M. B. Sugden), A. E. Crippen, Dauran Bros., Remis Daskam, F. E. De Voist, Ottmar Eberbach, Arthur E. Mannuley, J. J. Goodyear, H. G. Mayer, E. C. Edsill, Mann & Walker H. F. Miller, J. J. Quarry, G. Claude Decke, L. O. Cushing, E. E. Calkins.

P. S.—On soliciting signatures to our protest, the fact developed that we are to this day still paying the Spanish War tax on most proprietary medicines, although the Government has long since relinquished the same. At the time the tax was levied interested parties availed themselves of the opportunity, as stated in the protest, to boost their price considerably above the actual amount of the tax, and retained the advance after the tax was removed by the Government. This fact alone ought to justify our objection and demand your careful attention.

Mr. GRONNA. I have telegrams in the nature of memorials from J. H. Oliver, of Oberon; Botton Bros., of Edmore; T. J. Greene, the South Side Drug Co., and Welton McDonald & Co., of Dickinson; and from Otto Stensrud, of Beach, all in the State of North Dakota, remonstrating against the proposed tax on drugs and proprietary medicines. I ask that the telegrams be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will be so referred.

Mr. GRONNA. I also have a letter from Mrs. E. B. Matters, corresponding secretary of the Fargo Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of North Dakota, protesting against any further tax or any tax whatever on intoxicating liquors. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, this proposed bill is a war revenue measure in a time of peace. The United States is not at war with any nation. In the great conflict that unhappily involves eight European Governments, our country is absolutely neutral; and there is no fear that our territory or our people will be endangered or our peace disturbed.

It was different in 1898. Then the War with Spain was our own war. It demanded a sudden and great increase in naval and military appropriations, which were given with an ungrudging hand. Not one cruiser, not one regiment, has been or will have to be added to our defensive establishment because of the terrible strife in Europe. Our remoteness, our complete and honest neutrality, are the only present safeguard we need.

Why, then, this extraordinary proposal to increase the Federal taxes by an amount of $105,000,000 at a time when, because of business stress, all private manufacturing and mercantile enterprises and the people in their homes are economizing in their expenditures as they have not done for many years before? The answer is that the money is needed, not because of any war, not because of any external emergency, but to cover up the extravagance of the political party which, though it represents only a minority of the voters, is now in power in this Nation, and the utter breakdown of its antiquated fiscal policy of tariff for revenue only, that has failed to produce the necessary revenue.

The Democratic Party in its national platform of 1912 declared:

> We denounce the profligate waste of money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high, and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil. We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a Democratic Government, and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

The President of the United States, when a candidate for election to his high office, in an address at Washington Park, N. J., on August 15, 1912, said:

> Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not. They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to a very quiet and private retreat.

PLEDGES THAT WERE IGNORED.

Those platform pledges of "simplicity and economy" have been as coolly and contemptuously disregarded by the Democratic Party in power as that other pledge of exemption of American coastwise ships from tolls at Panama. Appropriations have been increased, and not diminished, and there has been an expansion in the number of those "useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people." Excluding the river and harbor bills in each year, the total of Federal appropriations just made will be $1,089,408,777, as compared with $1,057,605,694 in the year preceding, and $988,353,340 in 1912. Under this administration, with the political party pledged to "simplicity and economy" in full control of the Government, expenditures are not decreasing. They are mounting up, not going down. The reduction is not in the Federal disbursements; it is in the Federal revenues.

It is the national income that has been falling off, and it was falling off before this great European war began—before the first clouds of that war could be seen on the horizon. The new Democratic tariff law is professedly a tariff for revenue only, but as such it has signally failed to justify the one consideration which its authors urged for its existence.

It has undermined American industry, demoralized the country's business, robbed and ruined many American manufacturers and merchants, and driven thousands of American wage earners to idleness and want. Its pathway is marked by silent machinery and cheerless homes; its monuments are the smokeless chimneys of the factories.

INCREASED IMPORTS, DIMINISHED REVENUES.

Though this Democratic tariff for revenue only in its operations from the 3d of October to the end of July had increased the imports of foreign merchandise into the United States by the enormous sum of $102,323,319—a large part of this simply displacing the products of American industries without any apparent effect upon the cost of living, or any appreciable benefit to the ultimate consumers—the national revenue collected on this immense mass of importations has steadily been falling below the income from the tariff for revenue and protection that preceded it.

The Democratic tariff was approved on October 3, 1913. This is the comparative record for the 10 months up to July 31, 1914, of imports and duty collected:

Comparative statement of imports, and duty collected, under Republican and Democratic tariffs, by months, for 10 months, beginning October, 1912 and 1913.

Months.	Republican tariff.		Months.	Democratic tariff.
	Imports.	Duty.		Imports.	Duty.

Therefore, the new tariff policy had brought to this country up to the outbreak of the great European war an increase in imports of $102,323,319, and at the same time a decrease in customs revenue of $30,630,070. The new law had benefited foreign nations, had increased unemployment in the United States, and had seriously lessened the national income. These facts are indelibly written in the official records, which any man may read. A tariff for revenue only had failed to achieve the one professed purpose of the legislation, and an onerous income tax had failed to make up for the tariff deficit. We had untaxed foreigners to tax our own citizens, and the result was a national loss and a national humiliation.

TO COVER UP DEMOCRATIC FAILURE.

This is the real reason why this war revenue measure is sprung now upon Congress and the country. It is to cover up the breakdown of the financial and economic policies of this Democratic national administration. The record shows clearly that if there had been no war the Nation would have had a lessening income and an accumulating deficit. No economist of standing has any doubt that the income tax provision produced its maximum revenue in its first year. Not the most inquisitorial methods that human ingenuity can devise will draw more revenue next year, for the tax will be levied on incomes reduced everywhere by a year's severe depression in general business. Few, indeed, will be the business or professional men of America whose earnings in 1914 will not be very considerably below those of 1913.

In all this dismal record of Democratic failure history is simply repeating itself. The Democratic tariff for revenue only of 1894–1897, the Gorman-Wilson law, brought national disaster in precisely the same way. In its first fiscal year, 1895, the ordinary receipts of the Government were $313,390,075, and the ordinary disbursements were $356,195,298. In the following year, 1896, the ordinary receipts were $326,976,200, and the ordinary disbursements were $352,179,446. In 1897 the ordinary receipts were $347,721,705, and the ordinary disbursements were $365,774,160—a total deficit for the three years of this memorable free trade experiment of $86,060,924.

Democratic control in these modern times is manifestly fatal to the financial and industrial well-being of the United States.

A SHRINKING EXPORT TRADE.

It has long been the favorite Democratic doctrine, proclaimed from press and platform, that a protective tariff was a "Chinese wall" about the country; that there could be no great foreign trade under a protective tariff policy, and that a Democratic tariff for revenue only would bring us quick and easy mastery of the "markets of the world." But, like the Democratic promise to reduce the cost of living, this theory of a world trade has been totally demolished by experience.

Exports from America have not increased under the Democratic tariff. On the contrary, they have constantly and very greatly decreased. American manufacturers and their employees have seen their own home markets successfully invaded by the foreigners, but American manufacturers and their employees have been able to secure less and less of those promised "markets of the world." Following is a comparative statement of the exports from this country for 10 months from October 1, 1913, to July 31, 1914, under the Democratic tariff law, and of exports under the Republican protective tariff for the same 10 months of the year preceding:

Comparative statement of domestic exports under Republican and Democratic tariffs, by months, for 10 months, beginning October, 1912 and 1913.

1912.		1913.
October	$251,587,993	October	$268,997,024
November	275,077,667	November	243,386,413
December	247,344,417	December	230,775,481

February	191,135,844	February	171,605,138
March	183,446,790	March	183,934,601
April	196,233,706	April	158,967,303
May	191,055,800	May	157,492,718
June	160,172,880	June	154,105,469
July	158,173,653	July	150,959,659
Total	2,078,500,810	Total	1,921,897,845

In every month but two of the 10 months from October to July, inclusive, in which the new Democratic tariff for revenue only has been in operation the American people sold fewer of their products to foreign countries than they sold under the Republican protective tariff, which this ill-fated Democratic measure has displaced. The Democratic law was not an open sesame to foreign markets. It failed there as it failed at home. It has cut down American trade and American industry everywhere, and it has benefited no one but foreigners.

FEWER MANUFACTURES SOLD ABROAD.

The one most notable feature of American export trade for many years under the Republican protective tariff policy has been a constant and gratifying increase in the amount of American manufactured goods—the products of our great national industries—sold abroad to foreign consumers. The value of finished manufactures ready for consumption exported from this country has increased under Republican protective-tariff policies from $222,537,358 in the fiscal year 1898 to $776,297,360 in the fiscal year 1913. The proportion which these finished manufactures bear to our total exports has increased in the same period from 18.38 per cent to 31.97 per cent. Between 1912 and 1913 the increase of exports of finished manufactured goods was more than American trade was prosperous then at home and abroad. But now mark the contrast: In the first 10 months of the present Democratic tariff for revenue only our exports of finished domestic manufactures ready for consumption fell off to $581,124,168, as compared with an export of $652,671,433 for the corresponding 10 months of the previous Republican tariff law—a decrease of $71,547,265 as a part of the price which the American people have had to pay for turning the business management of their Government over to men who do not possess the wisdom and experience to conduct it.

All this happened before the outbreak of the disastrous European war. Our commerce was declining, our finances were shrinking. In a period of peace a deficit in the national revenues was in sight, and bonds would have had to be issued or additional and extraordinary taxes imposed, even if there had been no war, to make up for the inevitable consequences of an unsound economic policy condemned and repudiated almost everywhere else in the world. This is not a war-revenue measure now. It is deceptive to call it so. This revenue bill is a new proof and price of the historic Democratic genius for blundering.

TURNING THE BALANCE OF TRADE AGAINST US.

For many successive years under Republican protective-tariff policies the balance of trade had been heavily in favor of the United States. Exports had far exceeded imports. We had sold more than we had bought, and thus had secured the resources to pay the interest and dividends on foreign investments in this country, and in addition the huge sum of between two and three hundred million dollars annually demanded by foreign shipowners for carrying our mails, passengers, and freight in over-seas commerce.

But the new Democratic tariff-for-revenue-only policy has changed all this. No sooner had the Democracy come into power than the favorable balance of trade began to dwindle, until it has now wholly disappeared and an adverse balance is rolling up of greater and greater proportions. Here are the certain results of the Democratic tariff policy written in the figures of total imports and domestic exports of merchandise for the 10 months from October, 1913, to July, 1914, inclusive:

Imports and exports, and balance of foreign trade of the United States, 10 months, October, 1913, to July, 1914, inclusive.

The Democratic tariff policy has succeeded in 10 months in changing a monthly balance in favor of the United States of $138,976,158 to a balance against the United States in July of $5,538,344.

HOW HISTORY IS REPEATING ITSELF.

The American people are now in the unfortunate position of people buying more than they can sell, and under the necessity of raising large sums of money every year to discharge their debts to foreign capitalists and foreign shipowners. This process, long continued, can not but impoverish the United States, as it did in the memorable tariff-for-revenue-only period before the Civil War, which ended in utter disaster and the downfall of the free-trade régime, President Buchanan himself recommending that it be abandoned and the tariff duties increased to meet the necessities of American industry and the American Government—and this in 1859–1860, before the Civil War began.

Like this, that earlier Democratic tariff for revenue only produced a financial deficit and industrial disaster. It was overwhelmingly repudiated by the American people, just as this present Democratic tariff is going to be. This war revenue bill, rushed through Congress under the pretext of a war emergency in a year which for the United States is a year of peace, is the first step toward the destruction of the sinister legislation of 1913.

The one hope of escape from overthrow now cherished by the leaders of the administration party is a hope that rests in the calamity of the European war. It is supposed that this terrible combat may divert the attention of the American people from the demoralization and loss of American business that has followed on the Democratic tariff policy thus far. But merchants, manufacturers, and wage earners know what the consequences of the Democratic legislation have been to them, and they are going to see that these results shall not be forgotten. The country and the world are shocked by the scenes that are being enacted on the battle fields of Europe, but our business people and our working people are not unmindful of the idleness and the suffering here at home, over which there hangs no glamor of military glory. One of the great industries of Pennsylvania and of the Nation is the textile industry, a peculiarly sensitive index of the real condition of the country's business. The textile industry was singled out for particularly savage treatment in the Democratic tariff law, and we are in a position now to begin to measure the consequences of that vindictive legislation.

TEXTILE MILLS HIGHLY PROSPEROUS BEFORE THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION OF 1912.

Before the presidential election of 1912 conditions in the great American textile trades were highly prosperous. Thus the Boston Commercial Bulletin said in its weekly report upon the wool trade October 19, 1912:

> Not in the history of the trade, we think, has the New York goods market shown such signal buoyancy and activity during a Presidential campaign as it has this fall. Everything practically has been in demand, while the call for the spring trade has rarely been better. Nearly all the larger factors are well sold up on their spring capacity, and some mills have lines withdrawn from the market both in staple and fancy goods. This applies both to men's wear as well as to dress goods. The yarn spinners are likewise well sold ahead, and out of all these factors probably very few have sufficient wool to cover the orders already taken.

The American people were busy and happy then. They had work and wages and the money wherewith to buy their woolen clothing. That explained the "signal buoyancy and activity" of the woolen business. It was prosperous because the American nation was prosperous.

The Textile Manufacturers Journal of October 12, 1912, said:

Viewed in its entirety, from start to finish, the woolen trade is advancing. Spinners are generally rather independent, as most of them are sold up to January, and a few even further ahead. Men's wear and dress goods popular numbers of yarns are rather scarce and are becoming very hard to obtain.

A week later, on October 12, 1912, Fiber and Fabric said:

Both spinners and manufacturers continue busy. There is hardly a worsted mill of any description that has not about all it can attend to for the time being. The market is bare of stock, and owing to the sold-up condition of the spinners but very few spot lots are being offered.

The New York Journal of Commerce of October 24, 1912, remarked:

Mercantile bankers in the dry goods trade say it is not realized to what extent the volume of business in the country is expanding, or rather growing, toward what has been regarded as a high-water market. * * * The great activity in the woolen goods trade is now acknowledged by the leaders in the business in a public way.

The Boston Transcript of October 31, 1912, said:

Not since 1909 had there been such an eager and constant demand for woolen fabrics from the manufacturers of clothing. From all sections of the country large operators are making preparations to get woolens and worsteds for their final winter requirements, and they do not let an opportunity escape to increase stocks of staples in medium and heavy weights. So far as can be judged from the volume of business so far placed, the yardage is in excess of last year or the year before.

So active and prosperous were American textile mills that they were hard pressed to secure a sufficient number of employees. Before that fateful presidential election which so changed the whole aspect of American affairs and transferred prosperity from America to Europe, there was more work to do than there were men to do it. As the Daily Trade Record said:

The present scarcity of textile operatives is forcing curtailment of production in practically all the mill centers of New England, according to current reports. One manufacturer is quoted as saying: "You can not find fault nowadays with an operative for doing poor work, because he is ready to leave on any slight provocation, and he will probably be welcomed next door at higher wages than you can give him."

HOW THE NEW TARIFF BROUGHT REJOICING AND PROSPERITY TO EUROPE.

But the election of a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress in November, 1912, had a quick and significant effect upon the American labor market. Presently there were more workers than work. Hundreds of thousands of American wage earners voted their jobs to men in Europe when they voted the Democratic ticket—though they did not know it.

They listened to political declamation against the high cost of living, and presently they found the cost of living higher than it ever was, with no work to do, and no money in their pockets to pay it.

From trade authorities it has been shown how flourishing were the American textile and other trades before the presidential election of 1912. Business abroad was not so good then, but the inauguration of a Democratic President and the assembling of a Democratic Congress in the spring of 1913 brought a most significant change on both sides of the Atlantic. The situation had been completely transformed; America was depressed and Europe prosperous. As the London World of July 1, 1913, while the tariff for revenue only was in the making, said:

The Wilson tariff is certain to have a very important effect upon the cotton industry of Lancashire. Only this week a representative of a powerful American syndicate arrived in Manchester from Pawtucket to arrange for a supply to America when the new tariff comes into force of a large quantity of half-manufactured goods, which will be completed on the other side and placed on the American market.

This is supposed to be only the initial step in a big movement.

It is predicted that Lancashire can look forward with certainty to five years of remarkable prosperity. Trade will rapidly develop with the United States.

It is now a matter of record how those brilliant trans-Atlantic anticipations were realized. The Wilson tariff did make business good in Europe at the cost of the United States. It increased the profits of European manufacturers at the expense of the American dinner pail.

A BOON FOR ENGLISH SHODDY MILLS.

In the heavy woolen district of Batley and Dewsbury, England, is the center of the vast British shoddy industry—an industry for which there is no equivalent in America. As the report of the Tariff Board of the United States says:

The greatest shoddy producing center in the world is in and near Batley and Dewsbury, England. Of the 900 rag-grinding machines in the United Kingdom, Yorkshire, in which Batley and Dewsbury are located, has 881 machines. In the whole of the United States there are only 346 rag-grinding machines. * * * The English of the district of Yorkshire are very skillful in the production of cloths from shoddy and other waste products.

Until the Democratic tariff for revenue only came to their rescue, the shoddy makers of Batley and Dewsbury were exceedingly depressed. As the Yorkshire Observer of November 8, 1913, said:

The dullness in the cloth trade of the heavy woolen district is causing not a little unemployment. Night work has ceased at several mills.

Then observe the frankness with which this English journal notes the quarter from which relief will come:

Orders have been placed in Batley for cloth to be delivered in the United States early in the new year, and it is probable that when the revised tariff comes into operation a valuable market for the products of this district will be found across the Atlantic.

Thus the Democratic tariff for revenue only came in the nick of time to save the situation for the shoddy manufacturers of England. A few months later, on June 26, 1914, this same English journal, the Yorkshire Observer, said:

The effect of the new tariff in the United States is now seen to be beneficial to cloth producers in the heavy woolen district, and there is no doubt that even better results will be obtained when the requirements of customers on the other side of the Atlantic have been more definitely ascertained.

The use of shoddy in woolen goods had been steadily decreasing under the protective-tariff system in America. As the Federal census of 1910 said:

The figures show a marked decrease in the use of shoddy. The quantity purchased decreased 35 per cent and the amount manufactured in woolen mills for use therein fell off 10 per cent. In 1899 the total amount of shoddy consumed by woolen and worsted manufacturers was 68,663,000 pounds; in 1909 it was only 53,621,000 pounds, a decrease all the more significant when the growth of the industry is considered.

In 1907 the production of shoddy in the United Kingdom was 137,056,000 pounds. That is to say, with one-half the population the United Kingdom uses two and one-half times as much shoddy annually as the United States.

That is, this was the fact under the protective-tariff system, but apparently the Democratic tariff for revenue only not only increases the market in this country for foreign "woolen" fabrics made of shoddy, but compels the use of more and more of these substitutes for new wool by American manufacturers; for, as the Yorkshire Observer, already quoted, said on the 26th of last June:

It is quite evident that the Americans are converting more rags for manufacturing purposes in their own country. Last month they sent only 526 tons, compared with 1,200 tons in May, 1913, and, in addition, they are probably the chief buyers to account for an appreciable increase in our export of rags, which has been on the upgrade during the whole of the present year.

If I recollect rightly, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who sits before me, called attention to this fact as one of the results of the change in the wool schedule—that the American people would become a nation clad in clothing made of rags and shoddy and not clothing made from pure wool. Am I correct?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. PENROSE. Therefore, not only have our own woolen manufacturers been jeopardized, in many cases bankrupted, closed up, or working on part time, but the clothing which the average person is compelled to use is of the lowest grade of any so-called woolen material.

Here is frank British testimony to the usefulness of the present Democratic tariff in encouraging the rag and shoddy industry in America and Europe.

ROBBING AMERICA TO ENRICH EUROPE.

In the worsted mills of Bradford, as well as in the shoddy mills of Batley and Dewsbury, the Democratic tariff of 1913 was frankly hailed as a great benefaction to British manufacturing. A London cable dispatch to the New York Daily Trade Record of December 8, 1913, said:

The Bradford textile district is temporarily depressed. Some of the mills are already on short time, but there are predictions of active revival after the American tariff reductions on woolens become operative January 1.

Across the English Channel and the North Sea the Simmons-Underwood tariff law brought quick acclamation. At Verviers, in Belgium, the quarterly report of the Chamber of Commerce, noted in the Daily Trade Record of October 27, 1913, recorded "a drop of 25 per cent in the quantity of tops conditioned," and significantly added that all this would be changed by "an increased trade with the United States under the new tariff." A cable dispatch to the New York Commercial of January 19, 1914, reviewing British business, stated that "British business men are decidedly optimistic over the prospects for the new year," and added:

Chief among the factors favoring 1914 are the American tariff reduction, the effect of which is being felt in the woolen and tin plate industries, two lines which shared some slackening up in 1913. The condition of the tin plate industry was particularly bad in 1913, until the passage of the new American tariff bill, but to-day mills are working overtime to accommodate American orders.

The American people do not complain of prosperity in Europe so long as that prosperity is not purchased at their expense. But the Democratic tariff policy robbed America to enrich Europe. It took employment and wages away from American men and women to lift the profits of European mills. The Philadelphia Public Ledger of July 21, 1914, gives this illuminating case in point:

A Philadelphia underwear mill recently placed an order for 25,000 pounds of French-spun worsted yarn, taking the foreign yarn at a cost saving of $3,000, after a local spinner's best price had been submitted. The mill that lost the order in competition with a foreign establishment estimates that the labor involved is equivalent to the work of 60 men for 10 days.

It means that about $1,400 in wages that might have been paid to work-people here will go abroad. That's the way to look at it.

Abroad—in foreign countries—the Democratic tariff for revenue only was beautifully impartial in its benefits. A dispatch from Biella, Italy, to the Daily Trade Record of December 8, 1913, said:

Owing chiefly, it is reported, to the new American tariff, the Italian woolen industry has recovered to a large extent from a long period of depression, both in the spinning and weaving end of the industry. The revival is said to be especially marked in light-weight woolens and flannels.

WHAT THE NEW TARIFF DID TO AMERICA.

That is one side of the story—the bright side of the shield. Now let us look at the American side—the side of our own country, of our own people. On December 31, 1913, the directors of the Contoocook Mills Corporation (knit goods), of Hillsboro, N. H., "passed the quarterly dividend of 7 per cent preferred stock due January 1, the operating results of the year having been unsatisfactory."

Thus the Democratic tariff experiment began promptly to get in its work on this side of the Atlantic. Even earlier than this, on September 25, 1913, Mr. J. F. Maynard, the president of the Globe Woolen Co., of Utica, N. Y., one of the oldest and most famous wool-manufacturing concerns in America, making particularly fine all-wool fabrics, announced that the mills "would shortly be closed indefinitely." On October 8 the Globe Woolen Co. shut down entirely "on account of the new tariff." Nine hundred skilled workers were thrown out of employment. The owners state that the suspension is indefinite and may be permanent.

Thus the "New Freedom" was in practical operation. On January 24, 1914, the Alexander Smith & Sons Carpet Co., of Yonkers, N. Y., which in three years had distributed $342,000 among its employees under the profit-sharing plan, announced that beginning February 7 wages would be reduced 10 per cent to 7,000 operatives.

On January 28, 1914, the Enfield Manufacturing Co. a wool-manufacturing corporation, by a vote of its stockholders, filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy. On January 31, the Emmott Worsted Spinning Co., of Chester, Pa., was stated to be "in financial difficulties" and "to have made an offer of 50 cents on the dollar to its creditors by way of settlement."

On February 19 a reduction of the night-shift wages went into effect in the fustian mill of the Crompton Co., at Crompton, R. I., due to a falling off in the demand for the product, owing to the importation of German-made goods under the new tariff. The Crompton Mills made corduroys, velvets, and velours.

On February 28, 1914, the Rev. Charles E. McClellan, pastor of the Fairhill Baptist Church, No. 521 Lehigh Avenue, Philadelphia, Pa., was quoted as saying in the Philadelphia Press:

Every day I am besought by persons to assist them in finding employment. Except in some of the hosiery mills there is widespread depression in Kensington manufactures, and it is as difficult to find work for men as it is to procure funds for relieving their distress.

We are on the ragged edge, both from the workingman's point of view and that of the manufacturer. No work and prices soaring! Yet people will believe a theory rather than the established facts of history.

ALL THIS WAS LONG BEFORE THE WAR.

All this was long before the great European war had loomed on the horizon. Dullness of trade, idleness of workers, crowding demands on public charity and the philanthropic work of churches, were the result, in the United States, of what will be known in history as the colossal political and economic blunder of the Simmons-Underwood tariff law, which gave away the profits of American business and the wages of American workpeople to swell the dividends of the manufacturers of Great Britain and the Continent. Early in April, 1914, Mr. C. H. Brown, the secretary of the National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers, was quoted as declaring:

The common hosiery, known as the "poor men's hose," cotton lisle, and retailing at 25 cents per pair, is now entering the United States at $1.25 per dozen. The United States mills' selling price is $1.85 per dozen; the cost price, without profit, is $1.70 per dozen.

The foreign manufacturers, however, are only landing the goods at $1.36 per dozen pairs; they are selling at the American price of $1.85, and the difference, or 49 cents, is going into the pockets of the importer, jobber, and retailer, but with no difference in cost to the consumer.

Under the Payne law, this class of hosiery entered at between $1.85 and $1.90 per dozen pairs.

Under the Underwood law the foreign manufacturer can undersell the American manufacturer whenever he makes up his mind to do so, but for the present he is taking all he can get.

Mr. George C. Hetzel, a successful worsted weaver of Chester, Pa., said:

We are running about 60 per cent of capacity. I can not recall any time since 1896 that we have not run full capacity in March. Wages paid in our mill were 21 per cent less than in 1912. This represents a deduction, not in the rate of wages, but in time.

The Radmoor Mills, Thomas E. Brown & Sons, of Philadelphia, said:

Our seamless-hosiery plant has been practically at a standstill since the new tariff went into operation.

A few weeks later, in June, 1914, the Daily Trade Record, of June 20, 1914, said of the Philadelphia situation:

Mills making men's wear are operating about 70 per cent of capacity. In the lace industry nearly 60 per cent of the machinery is estimated to be idle. The carpet and rug mills are represented as having little business.

A few days earlier the Axminster department of the local plant of the Bigelow Carpet Co. at Lowell, Mass., had gone on half time.

The Lawrence Manufacturing Co., of Lowell, Mass., announced on May 25, 1914, through its treasurer, Mr. C. P. Baker, that:

Production at this plant is being curtailed 50 per cent. The small amount of business and general unsettled conditions are the causes. Dullness is due chiefly to the increased importations of knit goods.

MILLS CURTAILING AND CLOSING EVERYWHERE.

Depression was widespread throughout the industrial communities of New England, as throughout those of Pennsylvania. On June 20, 1914, the Textile Manufacturers Journal announced that:

Mill B of the Sanford (Me.) Mills, which operates on plushes, has been put on a four-day-a-week schedule, the mill to close down for the week on Thursdays until further notice. Mill C of the company has been running on a four-day schedule for about seven weeks, which means that 500 operatives are on short time. Supt. George G. Emery is quoted as saying that orders have fallen off steadily since the passage of the tariff bill.

That was in New England, which like Pennsylvania was one of the particular targets of the authors of the new Democratic tariff law. But it is difficult in the United States to single out any special section for slaughter without sacrificing the prosperity of other sections and other States. The New York Mills Co., located in a suburb of Utica, N. Y., and employing more than 2,000 hands in the manufacture of cotton cloth, was announced on May 5, 1914, as insolvent to the extent of $1,500,000. The preferred stockholders of the company were offered 10 cents on the dollar for their holdings.

On June 28, 1914, the Crawford Woolen Mills, of Martinsburg, W. Va., went into the hands of receivers, with liabilities placed at $160,000. "The mill has been in operation 20 years and employs 300 persons."

A few days later the Sterling Mills Co., of Bridgeport, Pa., manufacturing cassimeres and cloakings, shut down an equipment of 5 sets of cards, 35 broad looms, 2,660 spindles, and dyeing and finishing machinery.

At almost the same time the woolen mills of James Lees & Sons Co. in the same town, Bridgeport, Pa., closed down for two weeks. "Our shutdown," a member of the firm was quoted as saying, in the Daily Trade Record of July 10, "is due to two things—the operation of the tariff and the threatening of industries by proposed new laws in Washington. In other words, the business interests of the country are afraid of the present National Government."

On July 11, 1914, the Textile Manufacturers Journal announced that a voluntary petition in bankruptcy had been filed at Portland, Me., by the Somerset Woolen Co., of Monson, Mass., liabilities being given at $50,499. "No announcement has been made as to the future disposition of the plant, but it is thought that a resumption of operations by the present company is improbable."

These troubles could not be chargeable to the European war, which had not yet begun. The one cause, and the only cause, was the new Democratic tariff for revenue only—the ill-fated law of October 3, 1913—which was proving destructive alike to the prosperity of American industries and to the national revenues. On July 29, 1914, the New York Journal of Commerce announced the appointment of receivers for the Fern

Rock Woolen Mills, of Philadelphia, with assets of between $175,000 and $200,000 and undetermined liabilities.

SHORT TIME OR BANKRUPTCY IN SOUTH AND WEST.

There are not many woolen mills in the Southern States, but the new Democratic tariff policy of southern origin did not spare those that did exist there. On July 28, 1914, a voluntary petition in bankruptcy was filed in the Federal court at Nashville, Tenn., by the Nashville Woolen Mills Co., with liabilities of $80,000. This company had been incorporated in 1882, operating 5 sets of cards and 44 broad looms and manufacturing cassimeres, overcoatings, and worsteds. It was an important southern industry, but as it happened an industry on which the sun of southern Democratic favor did not shine. The unfortunate officers and employees of the Nashville Woolen Co. should have had the foresight to engage in growing rice or raising Angora goats in Texas.

West, East, North, South, the Democratic tariff policy was showing its handiwork before the European war began. On July 22, 1914, the Daily Trade Record, of New York, announced that the Knight Woolen Mills, of Provo City, Utah, "in order to prevent the laying off entirely of a large number of employees, or the indefinite closing of the mills, would be put on short shift five days in the week—reducing by 25 per cent the earnings of the operatives.

"It is further stated that the reduction follows the receipt of word from the eastern selling agents of the company to the effect that, because of the influx of English-made goods, there is no market for the product of the Provo Woolen Mills."

It was further stated:

The first severe blow to the local company following the enactment of the Underwood tariff law was the falling off in the demand for Mackinaw woolens, for which there was formerly a demand amounting to $20,000 to $30,000 a year from the Northern States. This business has now fallen to $3,000 to $4,000 a year, and the reason given is that, because of the enormous influx of English woolens, the woolen mills of the East have taken to the manufacture of the goods, of which Provo formerly made a profitable specialty.

The gravity of the situation here is felt keenly, and it is generally believed that, unless the demand for American woolens picks up exceedingly well, the local woolen mills will be obliged to shut down entirely, or else reduce the force of employees to half of the number now employed at reduced earnings.

HOW BUSINESS BOOMED IN ENGLAND.

These are depressing pictures—in America. Let us turn again to the bright side of the shield—to the lands where the Democratic tariff legislation had brought the active business and the good times, the full employment and the full wages that were so conspicuously lacking here. Let us turn to where the real, grateful beneficiaries of the Democratic tariff live—to the other side of the Atlantic Ocean.

As early as April 25, 1914, "there was a common report in Yorkshire that several Bradford shipping houses were declaring their invoices in London and provincial centers in order to hide the real extent of the trade that was being done with the United States. It was also stated that British manufacturers and merchants were objecting to the publication of the monthly export statistics of American consuls"—as giving the American newspapers and the American Congress too much information of the havoc wrought by the Democratic tariff with American industries. Thus, the Bradford correspondent of the Daily Trade Record of February 27, 1914, said:

The piece-goods trade exhibits further signs of expansion. Whether American manufacturers like it or not, there is an important business doing in fabrics which could be essentially produced in American mills. They consist of an almost endless variety of goods, from the thinnest summer-wear fabrics of a popular order to thick overcoats for next fall wear. Bradford shipping houses are unable to cope with their orders.

There was at that same time no noticeable difficulty in coping with the orders of American mills, where one-fourth or one-half of the machinery was idle and one-fourth or one-half of the workpeople out of employment. It is not strange that the British beneficiaries of the Democratic tariff legislation were solicitous that the real facts should not be disclosed to the American public.

But the American consuls could not be successfully muzzled either by British manufacturers or by a disconcerted State Department. In the Daily Consular and Trade Reports of March 23, 1914, the American consul at Huddersfield, England, said:

There is no doubt that Huddersfield woolen manufacturers are benefiting materially by the new American tariff. Many of the mills are gone on full time after many weeks of depression. The value of all kinds of textile goods invoiced through this consulate to the United States in February, 1914, exceeded by $199,000 the exportation of similar goods during the same month of 1913.

From Great Britain and the Continent generally woolen fabrics are coming into the United States in amounts and values three or four times as great as under the Republican protective tariff. There are imports almost as great in other departments of industry. The displacing of American-made goods by foreign-made goods in a hundred lines, and the consequent throwing out of work of American wage earners, begin to affect very seriously the purchasing power of the American people.

RAILROADS AND WAGE EARNERS HARD HIT.

The railroads—the amounts of their passenger and freight business—are unfailing barometers of the state of general business. Between January 1 and March 28, 1914, the New York Central Railroad, according to A. T. Hardin, vice president, had laid off 25,000 men—about 15,000 on lines east of Buffalo and 10,000 west of Buffalo. "Compared with 1913," said Mr. Hardin, "the business of this year on the New York Central suffered a reduction of from 8 to 10 per cent. The reduction of the working force has been in the same ratio."

Mr. James M. Lynch, commissioner of the State department of labor at New York, announced in his annual report that not since 1896, with the single exception of the financial panic year of 1908, had so many union workmen been idle. The cause, Commissioner Lynch said, was "simply lack of work. * * * At the same time idleness due to labor disputes was almost a negligible factor." There were 47,000 idle people in the clothing trades and 16,000 or 17,000 in the building trades.

That is what a few months of Democratic tariff for revenue only had done to the toiling masses of the Empire State.

The total operating revenue of the Pennsylvania Railroad system, East and West, for the seven months from January to July, 1914, inclusive, showed a decrease of $18,745,102.93—a shrinkage almost equally divided between East and West.

The New York Journal of Commerce of July 30, 1914, in its Pittsburgh dispatch, stated that:

A majority of the steel mills are operating actually from 33 to 55 per cent of their capacity, and the same can be said of the blast furnaces. A careful report on labor conditions submitted this week from official sources shows that in the Pittsburgh district, including a radius of 40 miles, there are 75,000 idle men. Of these probably one-third are railroad employees, and over 20,000 are in the coal fields. The steel trade and metal industries supply the bulk of the remainder. Financial reports indicate further that the pay roll of the district is $350,000 per day less than a year ago, when it was averaging $1,000,000 a day.

The American Protective Tariff League, of New York, in a bulletin issued in July last, said:

A startling decrease in the income and purchasing power of American wage earners in this period of industrial and business depression, following the enactment of the Underwood free-trade tariff law, is shown as the result of careful inquiry by the American Protective Tariff League. The decrease in pay-roll checks passing through the banks in the chief centers of industry and business is the surest possible proof of the serious blight that free trade has inflicted upon the earning and spending capacity of American labor.

This shrinkage in wage payments, as reported by 64 banks, amounted to $866,908.01 in the third week in June, 1914, as compared with the third week in June, 1913, when the Payne protective tariff was in operation. If the same rate of decrease should apply for the whole year from the 64 banks reporting, it would show a decrease of wages paid amounting to $45,079,216.52. If applied to all the banks of the country for a full year, the shrinkage would amount up into hundreds of millions of dollars. It is a shrinkage that is felt in every line of business. When a free-trade tariff thus reduces the number and contents of American pay envelopes the calamity becomes nation wide.

PROTEST OF PENNSYLVANIA MANUFACTURERS.

The Manufacturers' Association of Montgomery County, Pa., over the signature of C. F. Williams, president, and W. W. Finn, secretary, on July 17, 1914, sent a letter to President Wilson, stating that—

In a great measure that part of the Schuylkill Valley for which we now speak is industrially paralyzed—

Urging modifications and increases of the tariff, and reminding President Wilson that—

No finer opportunity ever presented itself to any political party to rise above partisanship and serve the people than is now offered the Democratic Party to so change the present tariff law as to give both capital and labor a decent chance in the country in which that Democratic Party boasts that it is the servant of the people.

This memorial of the Montgomery County manufacturers further said:

Is capital to be tabooed? Are successful business men to be declassed as citizens and classified as malefactors? Is the law to say to one class of citizens, Sabotage is lawful; and to another class, Property is plunder? The feeling is abroad that malice and class hatred are being toyed with by our representatives in Washington. Men are frightened as never before in the history of this Nation. They tremble for their country. They fear the cause of the depression is more dangerous than the effect. Men bear to you the tidings, so it is said, that there is no depression; men are not out of work; the country suffers from nothing but "calamity howlers." Our answer is this: In the Schuylkill Valley there is depression; the streets of the Schuylkill Valley towns are lined with men who have no work and who one year ago were well employed; the floors of the Schuylkill Valley warehouses are piled with goods for which there is no market and no demand. We speak only for the Schuylkill Valley, but for that we do speak. When any man rises in your presence to tell you, as President of our country, that these men in the Schuylkill Valley can work if they will, that the work is here and that they are crying out merely to discredit your administration, that all this talk about depression is due to an inflamed imagination, then we rise to say that that man, whoever he may be, is guilty of mockery that is exquisitely cruel.

Up to the present time no reply has come from the White House.

During the ten days ending May 24, 1912, 35 coke ovens were put out of blast in the Connellsville district.

Mr. Alba B. Johnson, president of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, in a statement on June 24, 1914, before the United States Commission on Industrial Relations at Philadelphia said that "In the last year the number of men employed by the Baldwin Locomotive Works has decreased from a normal working force of between 17,000 and 18,000 to 8,200."

On July 16, 1914, the New York Journal of Commerce announced that—

Revision of the tariff schedules affecting glass is responsible for the establishment by the Von Gerichten Art Glass Company of Columbus, Ohio, of a plant in Munich, Germany. It was explained by an officer of the company that under the reduced tariff the product can be manufactured more advantageously and imported into the United States on better terms than can be made here.

HAVOC IN THE STEEL AND IRON TRADE.

On June 25, 1914, Judge Gary, in an address to the presidents of the subsidiary companies of the United States Steel Corporation, said:

I think you will agree with me that in our line, taken as a whole, business conditions during the last few months have been worse than before at any time during the last decade.

That the tariff law lately passed has adversely affected the business condition of this country is my judgment. This is not or ought not to be a political question. It is an economic question. To my mind it is unfair to any country to place it upon a free-trade basis if it has to come into competition with another country which is on a protective basis, assuming, of course, that the interests of the countries respectively are the same with reference to the application of laws of this kind. I have never believed in protective laws which would permit the citizens of any country to collect unreasonable prices for their commodities. I believe protection should cease at the point where mere protection is afforded and where opportunity to oppress commences. But the present laws, so far as they affect our business at least, are not in my judgment adequate to protect. We have reason to expect that with the present tariff law the earnings of manufacturers will not be as large as they ought to be in order to furnish to the investor a fair return on the capital actually invested in his business or the payment to his employees of the wages they need and should be entitled to receive. If this be true it is only a question of time when the majority of the people will realize that unreasonably low-tariff rates are not of general benefit, and in that case there will be a change in the policy of the country.

Mr. J. C. Maben, president of the Sloss-Sheffield Steel & Iron Co., as quoted in the New York Sun of April 14, 1914, declared that—

The outlook in the steel industry is devoid of hope for even a moderate return of activity in the near future, as a result of the tariff. This is the trouble with the new tariff—

Said Mr. Maben:

It makes this country subservient to Europe. The minute business picks up here the European manufacturers will ship goods in and underbid us until their home market improves. There can be no independent steel market movement in this country under the new tariff.

Mr. Maben added that he was a southern manufacturer; his company was a southern company; he had served as an officer in the Confederate Army under Lee; but that the new tariff was producing a profound effect upon southern sentiment, and that the widespread business depression should operate to make it impossible for the Democrats to elect even one man to Congress north of Mason and Dixon's line, except possibly in the Tammany strongholds.

Mr. John A. Topping, president of the Republic Iron & Steel Co., speaking after the new tariff had been a few months in operation, declared that—

About 250,000 steel workers were either out of work or on reduced pay, due to foreign competition at seacoast points following the tariff reduction.

Mr. Topping added:

While the American manufacturer has not abandoned seacoast markets, yet to hold those markets on account of the high labor and transportation costs profits have been sacrificed and it necessarily follows that if present conditions should be long continued or should lower prices from abroad confront us, wage reductions are inevitable.

The iron and steel trade is often and well described as the barometer of business in America. That its indications under the new disastrous Democratic tariff have been faithful and unerring is proved by the further fact that the new incorporations of business enterprises reported in the Eastern States in May, 1914, amounted in capital to only about $62,000,000, against $172,000,000 in May of 1913, while the total amount of new incorporations from January 1 to June 1 was only $428,000,000 compared with $1,060,000,000 in the same period of the previous year. "A shrinkage of more than one-half in new enterprise or initiative," said the New York Journal of Commerce of June 6, 1914, "means something more than a state of mind or mental mourning."

AN OLD-CLOTHES TARIFF.

When times are dull people must still eat and food must be purchased. But they can postpone the buying of new clothes and wear old suits another year. This, apparently, is what has happened under the Democratic tariff for revenue only, which may well be called an old-suit tariff. In the New York Daily Trade Record of June 19, 1914, one of the chief clothing manufacturers of the country said:

We have not sold 50 per cent of what we sold this time last year, and if this is not an indication that the boys' clothing trade is far from good, nothing is.

The retailer is afraid to buy. He is living from hand to mouth. A few years ago he would place a substantial order, covering perhaps the entire season, whereas now he buys just what he needs and no more. There is no fear of cancellation. There is nothing to cancel.

So thousands and thousands of American schoolboys are and have been wearing old clothes another season because of the blight to business and the loss of employment of their fathers, due directly and solely to economic blundering in Washington.

One of the few business men quoted in favor of a reduction of the tariff last year was Mr. Frank S. Turnbull, vice president of the Rogers Peet Co., a great clothing concern of New York. The Daily Trade Record quoted Mr. Turnbull thus, May 25, 1914—he had just returned from Europe on the Mauretania:

Thirty-five per cent ad valorem duty on products of wool, as defined in Schedule K, is too low. Forty-five or 50 per cent would give us all the foreign goods we need, for style, quality, or competition, at practically no greater cost to the consumer, enabling our own mills to be more generally employed, and at a living profit. Invite capital to-day to invest in woolen or worsted plants, and watch the response. * * * British manufacturers who have been doing business with the United States under the old protective tariff have doubled and trebled their former business under this new tariff.

Mr. Turnbull was one of the gentlemen whose criticisms of the former Schedule K were most impressively quoted by the Democratic authors of the present tariff law, whose effects he now describes as beneficial only to Europe and disastrous to America.

A CASE IN POINT IN PENNSYLVANIA.

It is significant that Schedule K has almost dropped out of the Democratic vocabulary these days. Some weeks ago Representative PALMER, of Pennsylvania, ventured to declare:

In my own town of Stroudsburg, Pa., a large woolen mill which closed down before the tariff law was passed has been reopened for business with apparently good prospects.

Whereupon the president of this large woolen mill, Mr. Thomas J. Kitson, of Thomas Kitson & Son (Inc.), stated in the Textile Manufacturers Journal of June 27, 1914:

Congressman PALMER is perfectly right in saying that the mill at Stroudsburg closed down before the tariff law went into effect. This is true; but at that time I was sole owner, and did it on account of local conditions, and when I closed the mill I had four months' work before me, which was turned over to other manufacturers.

The mill was opened in March as a corporation, and we had to start with orders on a semistaple fabric, which we have been making for the last five or six years, and by constant effort we have been able to keep running, and if we retain our health we expect to continue as long as we can run without a loss.

In my limited experience as a manufacturer I do not recall as uncertain a market as the present, not only in the selling of merchandise, but in the purchasing of raw materials. I hope that the people who read the extract from the Philadelphia North American will not take the item seriously, as it appears to me as a joke. Nevertheless, business is unsatisfactory—low prices, constant change in styles and fabrics and ruinous competition. We do not give any credit to the Democratic Party for being able to run our plant, but will be thankful if we can continue without loss.

We have other industries in Stroudsburg that are working three days a week, and most of the plants are working short time. I wonder if the explanation is psychological.

The great manufacturing communities of Pennsylvania, as well as the small communities, are learning every day by their keen individual experience the inevitable consequences of the economic policy which Representative PALMER champions. The Daily Trade Record of September 30, 1914, speaking of conditions in one of the most important of Philadelphia manufacturing districts, says:

"Never has Kensington experienced such poverty and destitution," states Mrs. M. W. Ketchum, the manager of the Richmond Soup Society. "Virtually all mills in this part of the city have shut down, and the poorer employees are absolutely without food. In many cases also they lack clothing. Thousands are undergoing the tortures of hunger. Fathers and sons tramp the streets despondently, while wives and little ones cry for food at home. Children can not go to school for lack of shoes. Each morning hundreds of people line up before the offices of the mill still in operation in a vain attempt to receive work.

"If the people who are so anxious to sympathize with and help the destitute of Europe could spend one day at my home, and see starving children and mothers beg me for food, they would realize that there is more than enough for them to do here in Philadelphia," added Mrs. Ketchum.

PRICES OF FOREIGN GOODS HIGHER THAN EVER.

Though American mills were hard pressed under the new Democratic tariff policy, no compensating benefits reached the masses of the people. Most European manufacturers apparently did as did those Chinese growers of coarse carpet wools, according to L. O. McGowan, the head of the China-American Trading Co., of Tientsin, China, who said in the Daily Trade Record of July 20, 1914:

The Chinese wool growers and dealers have increased the price of their wool to offset the elimination of the tariff. It costs us as much to deliver raw wool in New York as it did under the old tariff.

Said Isadore Saks, a member of a great dry-goods house, in the New York newspapers of December 29, 1913:

Our buyers have been told before and since the new tariff went into effect that those from whom we buy goods intended to exact higher prices from us.

At the same time Appraiser Higgins, of the Port of New York, said:

I have heard reports that the foreigners intend to take advantage of the tariff reduction by adding on the duty to their selling price.

The editor of the American Sheep Breeder, of Chicago, a few weeks ago asked the principal department stores and merchant-tailoring establishments of Chicago whether there had been any reduction in price to retail purchasers of clothing under the new tariff law. They said that they could get their cloth for somewhat less, but that the completed clothing was sold to the people for the same prices as before—only one house making an exception to this—but declaring that men's ready-to-wear suits showed a decided reduction in price when offered at clearance sales. In other words, in order to secure cheaper clothing in Chicago under the new tariff law it is necessary to watch for and grab at the bargain counter.

NO MORE TALK OF THE COST OF LIVING.

Innumerable instances could be cited to prove that though employment has been reduced and wages thereby cut, the cost of living is as high as or higher than ever in America. Our Democratic Department of Commerce, in its Monthly Summary of Foreign Commerce of the United States for August, 1914, quotes the monthly average export prices of principal domestic products for July, 1914, under the new tariff law and for July, 1913, under the previous tariff legislation. Anthracite coal, which sold for $5.09 a ton in July, 1913, was selling in July, 1914, at $5.32 a ton—an advance in the cost of the fuel of the people. Coffee had gone up slightly, from 15.6 cents to 15.9 cents a pound. Unbleached cotton cloths had advanced from 6.9 cents a yard to 7.6 cents, and bleached cotton cloths from 7.7 cents to 8.8 cents.

Eggs, which were selling wholesale at 19.8 cents a dozen in July, 1913, were bringing 20.6 cents in July, 1914. Dried apples had gone up from 7 cents to 8.7 cents a pound, prunes from 5.1 cents to 8 cents, and raisins from 6 cents to 7.3 cents. Fresh beef had advanced from 11.3 cents to 12.7 cents, and bacon from 13.4 cents to 13.9 cents. Butter, which was selling at 23.4 cents a pound in July, 1913, brought 23.9 cents in July, 1914—and there was less work and less income for the average family. Refined sugar, which sold at 3.6 cents a pound in July, 1913, sold at 3.8 cents a pound in July, 1914—according to these official figures of the Government. Potatoes had advanced from 77.6 cents to $1.08 a bushel.

These official records tell their story—but there is no real need of presenting them. Everybody knows that the Democratic pledge to reduce the cost of living has not been kept—that the Democratic prophecy has proved an utter failure. It is probable that this promise to reduce the cost of living did more than any other thing to win for President Wilson the plurality vote which in the face of the division of his protectionist opponents gave his party the victory in the election of November, 1912. It was a promise which in the very nature of things could not be kept, but it served its purpose of humbugging some of the American people. They can not be humbugged again. It is everywhere tacitly recognized that they can not be fooled a second time—and all talk of the cost of living has dropped suddenly out of Democratic discussion of the issues of the day.

WORSE THAN WAS FEARED.

The authors of this so-called war-revenue measure themselves acknowledged the utter failure of their original fiscal legislation by framing a bill which is estimated to yield as great an additional income as $105,000,000. They assume and acknowledge with reason that bad as the record of their tariff legislation is already, it is going to be worse. They are providing liberally for the utter collapse of their fiscal system. In their hearts they have no more faith in it than have Republicans. Therefore, they are using this occasion and opportunity of the European war to make a very generous provision for the future and to cover up the inevitable consequences of their own shortcoming for several years to come. Their foresight now is more to be commended than their sagacity last year when their tariff bill was pending. They have learned something in the interval. They have come to a realizing sense that an economic policy that closes mills in the United States and transfers their trade to Europe will inevitably bring disaster not only to the manufacturers and their employees, but to the National Treasury also. A year ago, in this Chamber, I predicted failure and disappointment as the certain result of the Democratic tariff bill, but I did not anticipate what has actually happened. I did not foresee that before that tariff legislation had completed its first year an emergency measure would have been brought into Congress under the shadow of a foreign war with which we have nothing to do—a measure estimated to eke out the failing revenues of a revenue-only scheme by the huge sum of $105,000,000. The Democratic record of achievement, or lack of achievement, is proving worse than its Republican critics prophesied, and in view of what has actually happened, I can only wonder at and regret my moderation of a year ago.

ONE GREAT COST OF THE WAR ON BUSINESS.

Without any desire to impugn the honest purpose and the patriotism of the leaders of the Democratic Party, it must be said that the warfare which that party has so long conducted on the conservative business interests of the United States has led to some very serious consequences for that party and for the Nation. The free-silver agitation, the free-trade agitation, the radical and vindictive assaults on large corporations and prosperous business, for no other reason, apparently, than that they were large and prosperous, have year by year been driving out of the Democratic Party in the Northern States the business and professional men who were once the choicest portion of its members.

So long as the Democratic Party was out of power this did not seem to make much difference, but now, unfortunately for the country, and merely because of a passing division in the ranks of its antagonists, the Democratic Party is in power; and it is suffering and the country is suffering because of a lack in its membership and its leadership of clear-headed, responsible, conservative business men. These men were in the Democratic Party once; that party long had a fair share of the merchants, the manufacturers, the bankers, the employers of the country. But one blunder after another, one unsound propaganda after another, has caused men of this type to leave the Democratic Party everywhere. Therefore, when the chance of politics has brought that party into control of the National Government, these men are not available for Democratic councils. The party leaders are handicapped without them. No such tariff law as the law now on the statute books would ever have been framed if the business men who used to be in the Democratic Party were any longer in that party. If they had remained there would have been no such tariff as the present tariff, and there would have been no war-revenue bill—none would have been needed.

The Democratic war on business has proved a terrible misfortune to that party by driving out of it so many of the men who are most needed in the councils of any great political party. But it has been also a terrible misfortune to the whole United States.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I arise to address myself to the speech just delivered by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. The distinguished Senator gives as his reason for speaking at the first hour of the morning that he wishes to leave on an afternoon train for somewhere. I trust the Senator may do me the courtesy of remaining a while with us upon this particular occasion. Apart from the gratification it would be to the Senate to see him occasionally, it would be a source of personal compliment to me to feel that he might remain to hear such observations as I might deign to contribute concerning anything tendered by him.

I will assure the Senator that I have listened with increasing interest to his manuscript address, which, if it did nothing else, added much to the infant industry of clipping bureaus, and gave great reward in certainly one direction to the usually unemployed; that is, those who busy their lives in slandering their country by making misrepresentations of its conditions. Having listened to the able utterance of the Senator, and noting what industry has characterized his pursuit, I thought that I discerned a reflection of many things uttered by him during the making of the tariff bill which we now speak of as the Underwood-Simmons bill. I thought I recognized many old friends that had been introduced at that particular time to stage their performance; and I am quite content now to be convinced that the Senator found it profitable to reintroduce them, much as the master of a Punch and Judy show, who, with his little manikins upon his knees, presses the lever at the proper moment that they may yap forth what the master spirit has whispered to them to gabble.

I am not a man to condemn a thing which my jealous nature really envies. A capacity, believe me, I do not criticize, which I am compelled to confess myself wholly lacking; but I wonder if the able Senator from Pennsylvania realizes the real situation presented by his arraignment of his country, written out with deliberation, delivered after reflection, and presented without apology. What a strange spectacle would be presented to the gallery of this legislative body were it occupied by those who were not at heart with our system and did not have an appreciation of the exceeding partisan hypocrisy which is oftentimes indulged in by those put out of power and whose anxiety is by any method to return. That an able Senator of the United States, coming from so distinguished a State as Pennsylvania, should find it profitable to arraign before the civilized world his country as having resolved itself deliberately into an almshouse, its citizens begging from door to door, its factories stilled, its industries paralyzed, its capacities ended, its honor shamed——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, certainly; I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I would be the last Member of this body to say that such a result was brought about deliberately. I expressly said that I gave every credit for the patriotism and well meaning of the members of the party in power. At least, I meant to convey that idea; but I said that was the result, so apparent to all men that it hardly required discussion from me.

Mr. LEWIS. I am pleased to see the Senator recognize that there was due the apology for his utterance, after he delivered it, that he should have recognized before he made it; and to the degree that he continues to wish to apologize I yield at any time for such interruption, that he may at least clear his personal character of the accusation, which is bound to follow, of want of thought or want of patriotism on the part of so distinguished a representative of so eminent a State.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not apologizing to the Senator. I am trying to correct him. I do not believe he listened carefully to all of my remarks. I would not expect him to do so.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator says he is not apologizing—I regret his confession of a default of duty—but that he is seeking to correct me. In many things the Senator could do so, for I have really no practice in the art in which he seems so proficient, judging by the address delivered this day. He says I did not hear him. I assure my able friend that I gave the most patient consideration to his paper, for at the outset it attracted me for its mendacity, and it continued to hold me for its misrepresentation. [Laughter.]

I say to the able Senator that all of these conditions to which he alludes are born of imagination, undoubtedly, or, rather, are the result, I fear, of his having had little opportunity to be here in his seat and observe the official records which have been tendered from time to time in this body of the real conditions of his country at large, rather than that particular and specific condition which seems wholly to apply to the State which the Senator represents. Deplorable must be that situation; and, believe me, I view it as regrettable that a State which has been consecutively Republican since the Civil War, with very rare exceptions, could, with officeholders in every branch of it dominated by the policies directed by the able Senator himself, confess its situation in such blight and misery as to be the object of pathos and sympathy of the generous and the contempt of the just. I realize that we read from the public press that this very excellent State, with its unlimited resources, every now and then is presented to the country—with the administration in power guided by the able Senator from Pennsylvania—as having public officials who, when not in a penitentiary for having robbed the State, pillaged the statehouse, looted the treasury, are in office until they get from office back to the penitentiary. Now, this rapid mutation that seems unfortunately to characterize the coming and going of Pennsylvania's Republican officials, their entrances and their exits, no doubt may be due to the conditions which Pennsylvania presents to them in the way of opportunities for that political pillage of the Nation generally and of itself frequently. Yet if the Senator himself can find a pride in presenting his glorious Commonwealth as being so desolate in situation, so wanting in industry, so degraded in condition, then, while I deeply deplore that one of the great States of my country should have descended to such a low level, I must leave him to the fate of his constituency when he returns to them, when they look upon him as recording their State in the annals of the Nation as the most unworthy Commonwealth in the Union.

The Senator, I do know, has read his classics. I know him to be an educated gentleman, a man learned in those things which characterize the thing we call literature and education. Thus he will recall a character of Cassandra, who was the individual who could see nothing save in a very doleful light, the atmosphere of whose very life was murky and putrefying, whose every prophecy was of disaster of the present and the death of the future. While I feel that the Senator has been a disciple of the classics, I regret to feel that from this example alone he seems to have absorbed his policy, and therefrom seems to pattern—a Cassandra of ill fortune, a prophet of dire disaster, one who hopes for the destruction of things around him, that upon their wreck he may himself rise to some form of political conquest.

But I must again remind my able friend that his absence from our midst, regretful as it is, has been the real reason for his having obtained and absorbed this erroneous vision. I had the honor to know my distinguished friend when I was a Member of the House from the State of Washington and he then a distinguished Member of this body; and when I later was complimented by my now State of Illinois with the privilege of returning here, among others I naturally looked for in old and familiar places were those with whom I had borne an acquaintance. Often since I have been in the Senate I would look over to the seat which my able and learned friend was wont to occupy, trusting that I might see him in his radiant effulgence, in his personal contentment, and in his prominent personality. From these I hoped to gather that pleasing inspiration which comes from viewing things attractive to the eye and consoling to the spirit. But, alas! I would find the chair empty, from day unto day desolate, no shadow of my able friend shading his place.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, does it interfere with the logical sequence of the Senator's remarks for me to address an inquiry to him?

Mr. LEWIS. No; I welcome an inquiry from my learned friend.

Mr. PENROSE. The dreadful rumor has reached my ear from this side of the Chamber that the Senator was recently arrested by the Sergeant at Arms and haled into this Chamber by reason of his absence. I can hardly credit the rumor, and I hope the Senator is in position to deny it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it is true that if any information came to the Senator as to my being absent or present on any particular occasion it would have to come by rumor, for he was never present enough to ascertain the fact himself. [Laughter.] It is likewise true that at midnight, when this body was sacrificing much to attend to public business and the able Senator sacrificing public business to attend to his political business, when, wearied and fatigued, I had departed and gone to my club, thereafter an emergency did arise; and my colleagues, so that I should remain at my post, brought me forward with force and against my objections. But the able Senator from Pennsylvania had so hied himself off to such distant posts of anywhere, rather than hereabouts, that his presence could neither be ascertained by the officers of the law nor by his colleagues. Thus he could not be apprehended, even to be forced to do his duty in any form within the law. [Laughter.] It is that to which I am now adverting—the absence of my distinguished friend, but it is not the absences which have attracted me so much as his occasional returning after his absences.

Mr. President, if one turns his eyes to the heavens, when the mind is aided by the contemplation of astronomy, one recalls that the planet Saturn has a method, during the cycle of time, of coming, ever and anon, once in a while, and looking out from the heavens, blazing its brilliancy upon mankind below, and then retreating and retiring under a cloud, that when it shall come again the interval between its visits may attract, and its illumination upon return be all the grander. I must assume my able friend has been watching the course of Saturn and duplicating his errands, because I recall on one particular occasion I happened to note the able Senator in the Senate. We were then having under consideration a resolution touching our interests in Mexico—upon the affairs of Vera Cruz. From the public press of the Nation the able Senator had gathered that there were very serious matters afoot in the Senate. He knew that at that time his constituents, no doubt, would wonder why he was not present, and he had read in the public papers how a large attendance would no doubt be at the Senate, the galleries crowded. He could not lose that opportunity either to contribute his usual wisdom or to make the display of his attractive personality. Then he came, and I wish him now to note that on that particular occasion I credit his presence, and I remember he came with a view and for the purpose of opposing whatever was being done by the majority. True, the able Senator had not been here previously to understand the reasons for what had been done, nor had he knowledge why it was being done, nor information concerning the manner in which it was to be done. It was enough that the opportunity was his to oppose whatever was to be done by this administration.

I heard my able friend exult in the reflection that great trouble was possibly ahead for us. He could not see how we should avoid it. A cowardice he charged had beset us because we did not, with great force of arms, go into Mexico to avenge what in his mind were the wrongs to American citizens and American interests. I thought, as I saw the able Senator then, that we would soon lose him; that we would find him shortly taking his departure to Mexico, and with the aid of his perfect military presence and his command generally of the things which only succeed with the eminent resources which he can summon, giving to Mexico the aid of his great belligerent service. But no; the Senator had no doubt read of Don Quixote, who, mounted upon his Rosinante, took a tilt at a windmill, and my friend did not hesitate to come into the Senate and take a tilt at it with his personal "wind jabs." I was particularly attracted by my able friend as he poured out, in the completeness of his capacities, his declamation against us, pouring forth upon the air his maledictions on the Democracy, President Wilson, and the tyrants in Mexico. Then, with this eruption, the volcano subsided and apparently sunk into earth.

I did not see the able Senator again for some time, and then it was when we had before the Senate the question of the repeal of the tolls. The Senator had read that a very large and eminent population of Pennsylvania, designated the Irish, were likely to be greatly aroused, and he fancied, no doubt, how he could capitalize these distinguished and very loyal people into political supporters if he would give them the appearance that he, too, was now against England and make them feel what an Irish patriot he had become. Notwithstanding a short while previous to that the able Senator had voted here in the Senate for the very theory presented by the Democratic President in his recommendation for repeal of free tolls, he found it agreeable to return here for the purpose which his political experience sometimes had rewarded—that is, to vote against the very thing which he previously had advocated and voted for.

Now, I do not wish to be understood as making any reflection upon my friend. Personally our relations are most agreeable; but as I witnessesd that peculiar acrobatic performance I could not but contemplate how the record recited that the Senator at college was an athlete in body. Now I noted he had become one in mind, as he disclosed such an agility in political somersaults.

Then my able friend would depart; aye, he did depart. I would not see him again until many moons waxed and waned. I do not know in what he was engaged, nor would that concern me; but I remember again when I saw him here in the Senate for the third time. It was when the shipping bill was here and when there was an effort made by the Democratic administration to relieve the oppression of the Nation and seize it from the clutch of the Shipping Trust by affording some form of competition in shipping to aid commerce. The able Senator was promptly upon the spot, that the Philadelphia shipping yards might not be neglected or that the Shipping Trust which had so long drawn its revenues from his particular domain might not be overlooked in the favors which might be granted it by assuring it that no competition was to be permitted against its monopoly privilege. Then the Senator, with his voice and with his presence, regaled us again with his opposition.

I would have the Senator to understand that I rather admire him. There was something about these recurrent visits and departures which rather attracted me, because I remember it has ever been a maxim among a certain sort of men that familiarity with the great and too constant presence of the powerful weakens their influence and lessens attraction. I recall that history tells us that Pericles had a way of walking through the back streets of Athens on his way to deliver his orations, and when concluded taking his departure to the villa amid olive groves, only to be seen by a few; that he would hie himself to the classic valley where he resided until subsequently called again by a great occasion where his wisdom might illumine and shape the surroundings.

We also do recall that there was such a thing as the Delphic oracle. What an interesting personage that was. He was a very splendid citizen as we understand, and stood outside a very sacred place, seldom uttering an expression until an occasion arose—some particular untoward event—and then would in grave demeanor give forth the oracular utterance, sage, marvelous, mysterious, and confusing. For that he was known as the wise. The able Senator has patterned well after the oracle as it can be found sitting upon his tripod uttering occasionally his mystic utterances and sending forth his frightening and horrifying forebodings.

I will say, therefore, the Senator has something of my admiration for the success he has in emulating the oracles. The Senator will recall with me that little passage as I recall from the old editions of Shakespeare's comedies where Falstaff rushes up to Prince Hal and says:

> By my faith, dear Prince, you go to it; I will rush quickly and give the cut mortal and then me back to the woods, behind a tree. You remain, and if any comes to harm me unhorse them, as ye love me.

[Laughter.]

Now, does the able Senator from Pennsylvania fancy that merely by these recurring visits here and there to the Senate upon these particular occasions, when only he pretends in some manner to utter a mere protest against that which is—though he know not what it is—that from this he may gather the information of the condition of the country?

Ah, Mr. President, in a more serious vein I ask my able friend what would you think of this spectacle if presented in the reverse picture—if an able Senator, whose only voice in behalf of his constituency was to protest against any advance and whose only cry was one of disaster and defamation against his own country, one whose whole record may be searched in vain to find an instance when he could have ever found it in his soul to give approval for any work, however admired by men, merely because it came from a Republican President and a Republican administration? Shall it be said, and said in truth, that the able Senator who holds that altitude of place as a Senator from Pennsylvania shall perform the whole of his office with credit to him and true service to Pennsylvania by filling merely the position of one who would veto the right in order to advance the wrong, who would defeat righteousness in order that that which is evil might prevail, only because the right and the righteous came from a Democratic administration?

Is there nothing anywhere in all this administration good enough to meet the approval of my able friend? Where in the record of the distinguished Senator will he lay his finger now, to me his colleague and friend, where he ever found anything he could give his vote and approval to in the policies of the Democratic administration in two years?

Does the able Senator fancy that he can convince the American multitude that there sits in the White House a despot of legislation on the one hand and a traitor to patriotism on the other? Was there never any deed on the part of his fellow American and his neighbor, the President, worthy of the approval of himself in his capacity as official of the eminent State and the worthy people which with his ability the distinguished Senator represents?

How long does the Senator himself feel that the reflective sense of a just people, the judgment of a wise people, will continue in supine indifference to such things as this without their condemnation? If such should have transpired from a man on this side with such regularity and consecutive performance against a Republican President for no other motive than partisan opposition, what would have been the judgment of the Senator? I can fancy him crying out from the sacred scripture law demanding of that man's constituents, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do such thing?"

What is the complaint? It is, as I gather from the Senator's address, that there are things which in his estimate have gone awry in the country, and he will picture it as being of such desolation and distress as having dishonored this Republic. He holds up that disgrace for the gratification of her rivals, for the joy and satisfaction of her enemies. Mr. President, we recall that Pitt in the House of Commons, in his famous speech on the overtures of Napoleon, said, "Can it be possible that there are those in this House who would rather have glory from their country's enemies for destroying the honor of their nation than the reward of their own people for upholding its credit and dignity?" If the shades of Pitt were within this assembly it would not be difficult, indeed, to observe that in this great American House there are instances here and there when such a spectacle was presented to the American heart to the astonishment of the mind and to the sadness of the soul.

Now, the able Senator says that this bill which is the theme of his discussion comes as a tax upon the American people without justification, without excuse, and with nothing that can offer defense in its favor. What is the position of the able Senator? It is, as I construe it, that money has not been dragged from the taxpayers of this country by a Democratic administration in such quantity and amount as could repose in the Treasury in volume sufficient to have contemplated the mishaps of conflict in Europe and the disasters of war upon the world. How could such have been done? Now, my able friend, in the language of the sacred law, "come, let us reason together." What do you ask in that speech which is to go out to your constituents in millions of copies? Do you ask that the Democratic administration shall have levied taxes upon the American public to such an extent and such volume in excess of its needs that merely such should slumber in the Treasury in the form of a war tax, there to abide the time when the conflicts of the world might make such available?

If the charge be that the Democrats have failed to levy taxes sufficient to produce and maintain a surplus in the Treasury of such great quantity that could have been sufficient to meet all emergencies of extraordinary demands of the Government, as well to be in a sum equal to the demands caused by the devastation of the war in Europe, our answer is, we confess such is true. The Democracy declines to sit by and contemplate the prospective wars of the world and for such hold in the Treasury for emergency such millions of dollars, which may be required should such arise, and thus lay the heavy hand of the Government's taxing power upon the bread of the laborer, upon the clothes of the toiler, the milk of the baby, and the miserable needs of the poor, in order to heap into the Treasury millions of dollars dragged from the millions of our needy countrymen, to the object of providing a war fund to meet the demands of a war of pride in the Old World; nor, sir, to give exemption from the obligations of duty to the monopoly speculator, to the money baron, or that favored stock gambler who in previous administrations prospered in the distress of his country and in the oppression of his countrymen.

How could this sum suggested by the Senator or that which is claimed should have been reposing in the Treasury have been obtained? In what manner could it have been brought forth to slumber in idleness in the Treasury, or to serve as the resource of the favored money lenders of the land? It could have been gotten but in one way—war taxes upon the breakfast table of the poor and increase the prices of his food. The Democracy declined to put unnecessary taxes upon the poor man and to wring from his poor possessions unnecessary dollars merely because it had the power to do so. The tax could have only been obtained by levying it upon the clothing of the masses of our people, and then increasing the price of garments they must wear to protect their bodies from the rigors of weather. The Democracy declined to place this oppression upon those defenseless merely because it had the power to do so. These taxes could only have been obtained by levying it upon the iron and steel implements of the farmer necessary to his occupation, to his plowing the field, to has garnering the grain, thus increasing the price of everything he had to purchase wherewith to make his existence. The Democracy declined to burden his already pained and chafed back merely because it had the power to do so. This money could only have been obtained by laying the draining pipe of taxation against the breasts of the prosperous of the middle class and the treasury of the well to do merely because it had the power to do so. The Democracy was laying up no war chest of money by filching the pockets of the humble, draining the life of the miserable, confiscating the property of the wealthy, which it cheated the industries of the Nation and paralyzed the independence of its country. It confesses that it levied only such taxes as was absolutely necessary for the times and conditions under which the tax was laid. It refused to build a fortune for the unknown to-morrow out of the distresses of the yesterday. It laid no heavier hand than that which justice impelled and such as the then present necessity justified. It was content to await any emergency which might demand a further reaching to the treasuries of the people, and then make that necessity known in complete confidence that the sacrifice of the Democracy ever made for its people would be understood by the Nation and approved; that if an emergency arose that called for exactions of an unusual nature and of an unexpected kind the Democracy to the full extent that the severity demanded would comply, and then, and only then, would it entail upon its people the inconvenience or the loss—only then would it shift on the shoulders of the Nation the unexpected and disagreeable burden. But in doing this, in whatever hour it was called for, the Democracy had the abiding faith that, judged by the solicitude it had shown for its people in the past, it would be welcome to approach in the future the patriotism and regard of its fellow citizens, and to these make its appeal for whatever necessities the hour may require, conscious that the response would be in obedience to the demand and an indorsement of the course. As the Democracy has never lost consideration for the condition of its people, and ever served them to the full need of their justice, it has full confidence that the people in return will respond to the need of the Democracy and its demand upon the citizenship for the preservation of their Nation, the maintenance of the dignity of the country, and the upholding and sustaining the honor and devotion of its President.

Says the Senator, "All is a failure." What has been a failure, my able friend? He answers, "The tariff law passed has been a failure." To what extent, according to the charge and accusation? we ask. He replies, in effect, "It has failed to produce a surplus of money sufficient to have met these unusual conditions and the extraordinary emergency which has come upon the Nation, unexpected by all, which all would have avoided."

Again I answer, the policy of the Democracy, let the Senator understand, is in no wise whatever to lay its hands upon the purses of the people, upon the prosperity of the well to do, upon the poor possessions of the humble, merely because they can do it Our policy is as little taxes as necessary, not as much taxes as possible. Then could the Senator assume that $100,000,000 now made necessary by the conditions could have been anticipated by this particular framing of the tariff bill? My friend, $100,000,000, you say, is about to be levied upon your countrymen to meet this emergency. Well, under the Dingley tariff law passed in 1897 there was no anticipation of the Spanish-American War of 1898, nor did the wisdom of the leaders suggest the course of levying a tax so high and gathering the surplus in such volume that there might repose in the Treasury the $700,000,000 which became necessary for the Spanish-American War emergency. Where is the logic which in one breath can say that the Democratic tariff bill is a failure because it could not anticipate the war emergency of $100,000,000 and yours a success that failed, likewise, to anticipate one of emergency that called for seven times more?

How shall we conduct Government, if it be not upon the theory of ordinary business and in the course of common sense? The Democracy felt that if there came a time or a reason for additional taxes upon their countrymen in addition to that which was levied, they needed only tell their people the reason, give them the justification, trust to their patriotism and the approval of their sense and judgment in order to support the undertaking. Therefore I anticipate in the future that the opposition will be so discounted in the confidence of their countrymen that they dare not fail to tell the truth of the situation wherever it exists.

Fortunately for the Democracy we neither needed to apprehend such a state of the want of confidence in her or loss of patriotism on the part of her people. The address of the able Senator will be fruitless in seeking to frighten them on the one hand as it will be profitless to benefit him on the other.

Now, says the able Senator, here is this $100,000,000 to be raised. Well, I have a word with my friend. What have you to say, my learned friend, and the Senators who join with you in this protest, to this query? What remedy do you suggest for your country's predicament, this embarrassment which is not brought on ourselves by ourselves? What remedy do you offer? What refuge do you give? What is the thing you tender? You admit the condition of war in these European countries from which we had previously gathered great imports and which had paid revenues for the Treasury. These countries now have passed into that condition where bloody strife possesses them, and death has overtaken them. Their streets are deserted and their waters are red with the blood of life, while their babes cry and mothers moan for father and husband. Shall countries cursed as these be in a condition that they may contribute to the welfare of other nations? Unhappily for them their masters of trade are paralyzed in distress, many silent in death; all stricken in loss and desolation in this unprecedented calamity of earth!

Then, say I to the able Senator, $100,000,000 has been made essential. Why? Because the revenues, as the distinguished chairman of the committee in his very copious and unanswerable logic pointed out, our loss of revenue is now destined to be approximately $1,000,000 a day. If revenues have begun to approximate the loss of a million dollars a day, a hundred days, I say to you, my able friend, must exhaust this particular measure that has for its purpose making up this particular surfeit and deficit. Then what will my able friends on the other side say as to those other days to come? There must unhappily be recurring and multiplied other hundred days, and still another hundred days and—alas, for the gift of prophecy born only from events which the eyes may behold!—still yet another hundred days, until one year shall have gone into another.

Then with these many hundred days there will be the need of many hundred millions. How does the able Senator from Pennsylvania offer to obtain them if he characterizes this bill as a fraud in its inception and an injustice in its execution?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LEWIS. I am perfectly willing to yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I can reserve my answer until the Senator is through unless he would like to have me proceed now. If he has any objection I will not interrupt him.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator may adopt either plan which pleases him best, and which serves his purpose, either to reserve or at this time suggest to me a reply.

Mr. PENROSE. I could suggest to the Senator a number of ways of raising revenue which would not only produce the revenue but would bring back a certain measure of prosperity to the country; but I know that the hatred of the customhouse shared by most of the Senator's associates would render such a suggestion beyond any possibility of consideration. We could restore the duty on woolens and on sugar, and put a duty, perhaps, on Mexican oil and help the oil fields of Oklahoma and Texas, and raise this revenue without going into the pockets of the wage earners and the great masses of the people.

Mr. LEWIS. That, Mr. President, from the Senator is a very natural suggestion, but I say to the Senator, since he has given me a slight glimpse into his remedies, in what way will the Government get revenues from wool, iron, or oil from countries whose commerce is desolate, whose workmen are soldiers prostrate in the field, whose factories are dead, whose toilers are bleeding—lands which have no commerce and tender nothing to ship, nor have revenues to pay? The theory of the eminent Senator is born of a fallacy which indicates a lack of reflection on the part of his distinguished capacity. I invite his attention to the fact that he with his own deft fingers and artful brain framed and participated in the making of the tariff bill designated the Aldrich-Smoot-Penrose measure, yet he did not include these particular provisions to which he now alludes, but, to the contrary, wisely omitted them, for reasons quite acceptable to Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me, there is no war with Australia or with South America. Our trade is uninterrupted. England preserves the peace of the pathways of the ocean, and we could put these duties on and get revenues the first day they went into effect, and the Senator knows it.

Mr. WEEKS rose.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator from Massachusetts wish to interrupt me?

Mr. WEEKS. Either now or when the Senator is through.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield now, if the Senator from Massachusetts so desires.

Mr. WEEKS. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Illinois the Treasury figures show that if the same rate of duty had been carried on the wool imported in the first seven months of the operation of the Underwood-Simmons Act that were imposed in the previous act, it would have produced a revenue of $19,000,000, and substantially all that wool comes from countries which are now at peace.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts is in line with the policy of the theory of our opponents and is in the language of Iago to Cassio:

> Get money if you can. Get it honestly, if not, get it.

The suggestion now of our able Senator from Massachusetts is that according to his judgment one of the methods would be to levy a tax upon the back of every poor man, to levy a tax upon the clothes men wear, and despite the fact that the American people vetoed that very suggestion at the ballot box my learned friend, in the line of the peculiar despotism that marks the imperialism of the party that he represents, would defy the popular will as did his former President in vetoing the very relief from the oppressive course of that monarchical order of the Payne-Aldrich wool tax which the popular will had denounced at the ballot box. Yet, sir, despite the fact the tax was put on the people by tighter and more oppressive laws; for we recall that after the people had elected a Congress for the specific duty of repealing those taxes on clothing, and after the Congress had repealed the tax, the then President Taft vetoed the people's will, and by his imperial order riveted the tax upon them—a daring usurpation of the popular will—all indifferent to the fact that in a land of kings for less usurpation than this the enraged people struck the crown from the head of one Stuart, the head from the shoulders of the other——

Mr. WEEKS rose.

Mr. LEWIS. And the able Senator no doubt has in mind that if this tax on wool could be so high that it could give continuance to the wool monopoly represented in Boston, and where they gather from all the world the riches from this monopoly, this would give revenues, even if it stifled competitive industry. I answer yes, but the putting of this money in the Treasury as suggested by my able friend could only be done at the expense of many men who must wear clothes and pay the excessive taxes for the privilege, while the barons and manufacturers under their trust privileges go free and exempt. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts if he desires.

Mr. WEEKS. May I suggest to the Senator that the price of wool has not been decreased by the removal of the duty; and may I ask the Senator if he can inform the Senate whether the price of clothing has in any respect been lowered by the removal of the duty on wool?

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator, with that unusual but unconscious facility, unappreciated by himself, has adverted to the very thing to which I alluded. I answer, first, wool, it is said, is still at high price. Then I ask my able friend, Where is that prophecy he and the Senator from Pennsylvania gave but a few months ago, that if wool went on the free list it would be so cheap that it would impoverish the farmer and beggar the toiler? If it has remained at the price stated, why this false complaint of the Senator from Pennsylvania a moment ago from his moaning lips? I answer my friend, if he says the price of clothing has not decreased, abide a little while. The reason is not because of the operation of tariff on raw wools just now, but because those monopolies, evidenced by the conduct that we have lately seen through Massachusetts, have been enabled by combination agreements to keep the price of clothing high through monopoly contracts initiated by the order of things prompted by previous administrations, and despite the forms of relief tendered by legislation passed by this Democratic Congress have been enabled to defy the popular will and to defeat the relief to the country.

But now this Democratic administration, under the guidance of the President and on his recommendation, has passed a law creating a Trade Commission, which, when it has gone into power, will address itself to those gentlemen who have been enabled, notwithstanding the law and justice, to perpetrate these infamies upon the American public. The able Senator from Massachusetts need only abide his time for the establishment of the rights of the people and the sure method of the relief being executed.

Mr. WEEKS rose.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield again to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion, when I did speak during the consideration of the tariff bill I said the world's supply of wool was limited, and therefore a reduction of duty, in my judgment, would not benefit the people. But it will make the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] smile when the Senator from Illinois suggests that there is a monopoly of making clothes in Massachusetts or in New England, because the State which he so well represents makes more clothing than all the New England States and probably all the States in the Middle West.

Mr. LEWIS. Nothing pleases me more than to see a kindly smile on the radiant and genial face of my delightful companion from New York, and if anything I have said could produce that result, I am enjoying a blessing that in all kindliness oftentimes radiates to all from his countenance. But I will say to the able Senator from Massachusetts that he misapprehends the methods I denounce that have kept the high price of clothing unabated. I refer to those wool merchants, those manufacturers, those heads of establishments who hold the wool after monopolizing it, or who held it before through monopoly, and in combination, forced necessarily, together with the Woolen Trust and all its environments, the price of clothing to the point where it still remains in oppressive terms, despite all the efforts of a just Democracy.

Mr. President, my able friend from Pennsylvania says the seas of Japan are open. Yes; but Japan is an ally of one of the powers who are at war with another. He says the seas of Australia are open. I answer "yes"; but the finances of Australia, those of South America, and those of Japan were in the banks and in the vaults of the European countries which are at war, and to-day they have not the goods to sell nor the wherewith to enable them to stimulate their own manufactures.

I digress to ask my able friend, What avail would be the opportunity of imports? With your policy it would be to keep out by a protective tariff all forms of imports to this country. What avail would be the doctrine of yours? There being no goods to come in, no revenue could be had. But it is apparent to all that the condition of those countries is such, and will, unhappily, remain so for some years yet to come, to make impossible the realization of the suggestion of the able Senator from Pennsylvania—even accepting his free-trade theories on his limited articles.

Mr. President, I invite my able friend's attention to his history. Is there anything unusual in what the Committee on Finance have undertaken in this bill? There has come a condition upon our country, caused by other nations being involved in war, and you have to meet the depleted revenues to provide some recourse and resource.

I will ask the able Senator from Pennsylvania if it be not true that when Germany and France were at war in 1870–71, and the importations coming into this country were cut off and the revenues thereby proportionately depleted, did not the Republican Party then in power, of which the Senator from Pennsylvania is so distinguished a leader, do as we are doing now, so far as the principle is involved? They levied an income tax in 1870 of the date of June 4. They cut off a portion at least of the returns from internal-revenue taxes, and sought to make up deficiencies caused by the conditions which then surrounded them, similar to that which, in greater degree, surround us now, by the imposition of an income tax. Shall my able friend forget that only lately, when Japan was at war with Russia in 1904–5, and the exportations of Russia necessarily were curtailed and those of Japan such as she sent to the Pacific coast were limited, your own Government, recognizing that finances had tightened abroad, not knowing how far the war would extend, proceeded to do that which is in the memory of my able friend, namely, to dispose of bonds in the Treasury in order to obtain extra money to meet the deficiency of the Treasury? Then, where is the want of statesmanship in the Democracy now doing what was done by the party of the Senator's administration upon two occasions similar to that which paralleled the present event? Let us appeal more to the justification of history and less to the deception of politics.

Mr. President, what does this bill present? First, it tenders a tax upon beer and spirituous liquors. I ask my able friend, Do you oppose that tax? Do you oppose the tax levied upon beer and spirituous liquors? And in the time that the able Senator says he expects to take in reply to me I ask that he answer that. Will you, instead of laying a tax upon beer and spirituous liquors, levy it upon coffee, upon tea, upon sugar, upon the breakfast table? Say "yes," if you dare, and go to your constituents with the statement that you tender a tax on tea, coffee, and sugar instead of upon beer and whisky.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LEWIS. I again yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. In answer to the Senator's question, I will say that I have no objection to the increase of the tax on beer and on unrectified alcohol.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator says, Mr. President, that he has no objection to it. Therefore, sir, how righteous it must be if the Senator from Pennsylvania at last has found a thing against which he has no objection. The able Senator has no objection.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not think, however, it would have been necessary if proper economic and fiscal legislation was the law of the land. The States could have taxed those articles. You have got to leave something for the jurisdiction of State taxation, to the State governments, and my economic theories are those that urge the Federal Government being supported, as far as possible, by the indirect taxes of the customhouse and to leave direct taxes for the great Commonwealths of the Union. Of course the Senator and I differ on those subjects. I know that.

Mr. LEWIS. There never has been a time in our form of government since I have been permitted to observe its operations when the Federal Government did not levy some form of tax through the internal-revenue department upon beer and spirituous liquors. The levying of a State tax does not interfere with that, nor has it by virtue of levying the taxes intruded on the authority of the Federal Government, nor does the Federal Government, by virtue of levying them, deprive the State of that which it has heretofore enjoyed.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from Illinois will permit me, I will state, of course, that the excise tax is a time-honored tax. It is not a new feature simply because it is in this bill. Therefore I say that there is nothing new in the excise tax. The taxes on beer, spirits, and tobacco have been the recognized sources of revenue of the Federal Government, and are the only direct taxes that our Government has ever levied, except in time of war.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the conditions having been conceded, as we must concede them, the exigencies certainly are admitted that a tax, if to be levied now, can be levied upon no more appropriate subject, as conceded by the able Senator himself, than on these items.

Then, the next tax is imposed on the transactions of banking. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania say that he will oppose levying a tax upon the profits of those who use the money of others, or will he, instead of that, say that the tax shall be put upon the clothing, shall be put upon the shoes, shall be put upon the homes, shall be put upon the shelter of the people? Where, then, will the Senator put this tax? Will he say to his constituents in Pennsylvania that he opposes a tax upon banking transactions and would give them exemption, and to make up the deficiency would levy it upon the clothes on the backs of the toilers, the shoes on the feet of the children, who, he says, are going naked and hungry through the streets of Pennsylvania? Surely not. Then, what objection will the able Senator have as to this tax? I am unable to see that he has tendered any as a substitute.

I have this to say to my able friend, and I say it to all others with whom I bear in this Senate companionship delightful, however much I must discredit their political judgment, the Government can not be supported by carping criticism; caustic denunciations can not pay off the obligations of the United States, nor can unjust accusation as to the causes of the conditions of the Nation discharge our unfulfilled undertakings before the world. There must be some other method—something suggested that in its shape can be partaken of and enjoyed in practical results. Here we find able Senators on the other side of this Chamber, every time anything is undertaken and offered at the instance of the Democratic administration for the relief of a people who so long were burdened by the miseries, exactions, and persecutions of Republican administrations—these able men find some reason, some voice, by which they can oppose and misrepresent because it is politics.

I invite you for a minute to a spectacle that at least may interest you, if it will not convert you. In Germany and in France the socialists in the national legislature declined to put opposition against their Governments in the hour of peril. They joined in the legislative branch in aiding the measures necessary for the refuge and the rescue of their people in the hour of their travail, while our distinguished friends, in this constitutional assembly, in a constitutional government, under the name of Republicans, tender a form of opposition in the time of this country's peril that not even those who seek to blight all forms of representative government ever dared to sink to, but who, in a commendable form of patriotism, rise above mere partisan advantage—a fitting example which I may tender to my able friend, if not to be patterned after, at least to be reflected upon.

Mr. President, I must move toward a conclusion. My friends must understand that mere blind partisanship upon the eve of an election, however temporarily profitable, will not avail them for long, and has its sure penalties which can not be avoided.

As I took note of the observations of the able Senator, I find that the able Senator's position is that we have failed to accurately calculate. Then, say I to the Senator, let us concede his arraignment. Shall the Senator tell the Nation, because out of due caution for a people's rights and out of that regard which refused to take all the money we could have, that if we have failed in some slight regard to take as much as we should, for that reason the Nation shall be punished: that it shall be paralyzed in all its movements; that it shall be left hopeless; that it shall be given no opportunity to discharge its obligations; that it shall stand palsied? Does the able Senator present to the country the thought that because—even if he be accurate in charging that there has been a miscalculation upon the matter of revenue—that there shall be no support of the Republic and no provision now for any revenue? Has his Nation got to go out before the world a beggar, dishonored before her creditors, and repudiated before the world for lack of patriotism and want of statesmanship on the part of those who pose as the guide and support of the Republic? Heaven forbid that the able Senator should take his place in that category and have those who know him view him in that despicable attitude!

The Senator said, if I did not misunderstand him, and I do not inadvertently misquote him, that the income tax we provided for was a failure; that it did not realize its expectations or calculations. Come, my able friend, let us again employ a frank consultation. As to the income tax, I ask my able friend, Will he say that he opposes the income tax? Will he say now that he is for its repeal? Will he go to his constituents in Pennsylvania and denounce it? Will he ask that those who pay this income tax under the law shall be exempt? I say he dare not, and he will not. Again, I say to the able Senator, if the crime he charges is that the calculation has failed of accuracy, I ask why? The calculation, it is true, is based upon one of experience. For years the Democracy had tried to put an income tax upon the Nation, to make the powerful and the wealthy pay their just share in government; but through the manipulations of bodies that need not be referred to here, exercising their influence upon others, of whom charity and delicacy prohibit me from mentioning, the tax was assailed and ever defeated. Thus we were unable, until now, through voice of the American people, to put the income-tax law upon the statute books and enforce its execution. Untried in its present shape, wanting in experience on the part of its executors and administrators, if some slight error in calculation was made, it was but a natural thing, one to be apprehended.

But, let me say to the able Senator, the calculation of $70,000,000 to be derived from the income tax was not a miscalculation of revenue; it was a miscalculation of events. That it has realized but $31,000,000, I assure my able friend, history will record was the result, not due to miscalculation of figures, but, before God, a miscalculation of men.

These powerful rich, who find the able Senator ever a voice seeking their exemption from burden, while it was laid upon the backs of the miserable—these in numbers sped to Europe, hid their possessions, put their securities in strong boxes, where the eyes of the law could not behold them and the officers of the law could not lay hands upon them—they hid their possessions of millions and millions that it might escape the hand of justice and they might cheat the Government in refusing to pay the just share of their burdens. It seems as if a visitation of heaven has been ordered upon them by the events which have broken over them, for in those nations to which they took their refuge—these shades of delight and profligacy wherein they found their ease and pleasure—these have been rutted by rumbling cannon, trampled upon by marching hosts, thundered upon by shot and shell, washed by blood running in rivulets, and now inhabited only by terrified women, horrified men, and homeless children. Amidst all these their hidden possessions have found a way to separate and part; leaving their possessors helpless before their own crime, giving no relief, it is true, to their own Government because of the craft of embezzlement, and giving no blessing to mankind because of this visitation of God upon their offense. So, if we did miscalculate, my distinguished friend, it was not as to figures and dollars; it was upon the honor of wealthy men and loyalty of patriotism—all failing in such inglorious conduct as certain rich men have given evidence before all the world.

Why, the able Senator, speaking of the railroads—if I do not misquote him—says their incomes have decreased. I warn and inform my able friend that a body of railroad presidents, as quoted in the public papers and according to the speech of the able senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]—as I had it fresh a moment ago—stated to the President that a vast amount of income would be denied unless there was some increase in freight rates. If their calculations be accurate, I say to the distinguished Senator, not $70,000,000 but $170,000,000 would have been realized from the income tax levied alone upon the value represented by these men as existing in the report they made to the President of the United States. They either misled him to frighten him and terrorize him, or, if they told him the truth—those who had these securities—they had hidden in a great quantity their securities by which they could cheat and swindle that Government from which they sought protection.

Now I say to my friend, it may be that a system suggested by him, if accepted, might produce some results approximate to his anticipations and possibly fulfilling some of his hopes. I can not see it so.

But my friend refers to the extravagance of appropriations—and I ask my able friend not to hesitate to interrupt me if I misquote him, for that certainly he knows is not my intention; I was compelled to make my memoranda merely as he proceeded, and he reads the figures of appropriations from one administration to another, and then says there is an increase on the part of the present administration. From that I deduce, though the able Senator did not make it his own conclusion, that his purpose was to intimate that but for these excess figures there would have existed ample revenue in the Treasury.

I say to my friend that the Republican administration, of which he is so distinguished a representative, set on foot great undertakings. They were both alive and in process and in progress. Those undertakings had for their purpose, let us concede, not so much the benefit of our country as to serve a certain set of powerful agencies, so that those agencies out of the profits could serve the political uses of a certain political cabal and certain favorites in this country. But whatever may have been the motive, see what was done. Shall the able Senator tell his people in Pennsylvania that he would have had the Democratic Party, merely because it was opposed on political principle, cut off every one of those undertakings, stem them up, slay them as they had progressed, leave the men out of employment, and put an end to that which seemed the object of so much solicitude on the part of the able Senator? What could the Democratic administration do? The contracts had been made; they had received the approval of the engineers of the Government——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I left out the river and harbor bill in the figures which I gave, and it will save the Senator a whole lot of vehemence if he will bear that in mind.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator say "vehemence"?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator compliments me. I did not know there was anything in my address that he could characterize with a sufficient quality of attention. He speaks of "vehemence." Yes, "vehemence" is a good word to apply to me. I can imagine that no man could hear the Senator's declarations without noting statements within them that would drive him vehemently to denounce them. It is not vehemence the Senator means to apply to me, but indignation. The Senator may make his confession whenever he wishes, and his avoidance whenever he will. What the Senator did was to point out these appropriations, and he pointed them all out in bulk. If the Senator meant to exclude the river and harbor appropriation, he did not make it clear in his address, and when he turns to his manuscript he will discover that these appropriations helped to aggravate the charge which he made against the Democracy.

Mr. PENROSE. The stenographer's notes will show that I expressly omitted the river and harbor appropriations of this Congress and of the last.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the river and harbor bill was but a part. I remember a distinguished Senator a short while ago characterized the Democracy as unpatriotic for its failure to care for the American Navy. That is a charge which has fallen from the Senator's eminent associates time and time again, that we will do nothing to uphold the Navy. We have provided $31,000,000 additional for the provisioning and maintenance of the Navy; and yet we are condemned for doing the very thing that they condemn us for not doing.

Mr. President, the conditions in Mexico, as unhappy as they are regrettable, forced upon us expenditures far in excess of that which was desired by anyone. Yet shall the Senator say he would have had all this enterprise of peace, dignity, and honor in Mexico paralyzed and stayed? He was one of those who lent his powerful voice and influence to the condemnation of the President and the administration wherever raised in connection with affairs in Mexico. How would he now behold the situation if he would do so in justice? He would contemplate the course of the President and the administration as having been rewarded by such success that the only individual who tendered an insult to our country was compelled by the pacific course of the President, surrounded with the force and resolve of a manly man and patriotic statesman, to flee his shores and become a refugee from his own country; salutations paid to our flag by his whole nation, and the honor of our country recognized throughout the world; all, too, without firing a shot in the offensive, without the death of a man in declared war, without the sacrifice of one principle of the theory of our Republic. Shall the Senator then condemn in order that it avail in some political hour with those who might not understand?

Mr. President, I have heard the allusion—I do not know whether the Senator from Pennsylvania made it—to $75,000,000 in the banks. Yes; where did we get this money? If the charge is, as the distinguished Senator would have you understand, that the tariff law has been a failure, that it could provide no revenue, that it has wholly failed in its undertakings, where did the $75,000,000 or any million dollars of surplus now in the Treasury come from? Well, it may be answered from many sources the money came, but from the tariff must be admitted. Now, who condemns this placing the money in the banks? The distinguished Senators, the colleagues of my able friend, condemn what? Why, I heard one of the allies of our distinguished bombarding general talk about the great infamy on the part of Democracy of placing this $75,000,000 in the banks. Let us have the truth. The Democracy never placed any $75,000,000 in any banks. Sixty million dollars of this money was placed there by a preceding Republican administration, but the Democracy had too much patriotism and pride merely to extract it because it happened to be placed there by a Republican administration. To that $15,000,000 more has been added by the present Secretary of the Treasury, and many other millions scattered throughout this country, in order that there might be a crop-moving fund. We get $1,500,000 annual interest from this money. Where, may I ask, is that annual panic that has heretofore come upon our country every year just before the moving of the crops, caused by those favored bankers who, having the money from the Treasury and paying not one cent of interest upon it, would tighten it so as to make it impossible for the farmer to get money to move his grain to market except at usurious rates—prohibitive—all to give favor to those borrowing "call money" for stock gambling?

Ah, that day went by under the patriotic zeal of the present distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, whose keen business sagacity scented their purpose, and with the strength and courage of one of his political progenitors, Andrew Jackson, gave these men to understand that if they dared to commit that crime again upon the American public punishment would be meted out to them before the eyes of America; and in order to assure that they should not have the chance he provided the method by which the people's money should be enjoyed by the people. Do I hear complaints from my able friends because of this? Would you bring decay upon the crops? Would you leave them in the furrow? Would you rot them in the bin? Would you prevent them from reaching market? Would you deny prosperity and opportunity to the farmer? Then, why this cavil? Why this criticism? Why this condemnation? Where is the justice, aye, where is the sense of it?

My friends on the other side—for such you are—your position, if I understand your spokesman, my able and distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, is that the tariff law has built up enterprises in Europe and has destroyed enterprises in America. In one breath I heard you refer to the tariff law, if I do not misquote you, as being the southern-made tariff law, to leave the impression upon the thousands of constituents who will read your speech, that that ancient sectionalism of which many of you gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber in years past capitalized to such an extent still exists here in the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. Does not the Senator think that the epithet is well applied when the wool of the Wyoming ram is put on the free list while the hair of the Angora goat of Texas is protected at the old Dingley rates at the request of a Texas Congressman?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it is not the Angora goat but the Republican goat which has been gotten by this administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. Well, the Angora goat is the chief beneficiary. The answer of the Senator from Illinois is on a par with a large part of his argument, infusing into a serious discussion frivolity.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, my able friend referred to the Angora goat. I remember hearing his very witty and attractive speech upon the question of the Angora goat and Texas Congressman during the tariff debate. That seems to be introduced here. Evidently my able friend feels that a dissertation on goats introduced here is not frivolous, but is very dignified, very ponderous, and very pregnant with much wisdom. We will dismiss the subject of goat as being the butt of the Senator's joke. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I referred to the charge which the able Senator intended to convey, that the tariff bill had been made in sections to serve the private exemptions and privileges of the South as against the North. I can not speak for the South. I do not offer any defense in her behalf. She needs none. While born from her bosom and cradled in her generous arms and reared to manhood beneath her blessed skies, I moved out to the West, where the capacious hospitality of the western heart has placed me under a debt of gratitude far beyond expression. I speak as a western Representative, honored by the noble West to speak for her, yet I serve as an American.

Yet these eminent men who represent the South need go no further in the defense of the accusation made by the Senator than to take the speech of the able Senator, which points out how these mills in the South, these cotton mills in the South, these woolen mills that have been undertaken, have withered and died. He read from a Tennessee correspondent calling attention to how this tariff act, which he says was southern, had slain the southern industries. Can it be that these men are so short-sighted that they drew their swords against themselves?

I merely invite the able Senator to this that he may see how utterly inconsistent was his attitude and how manifestly without logic or decency was the implication.

Mr. President, the existing tariff act, like all tariff acts, has its weaknesses and deficiencies, because we can not distribute a tariff measure in such a manner as to fit equally upon all parts and property of the Nation. Certainly this one can not be free from some of those particular shortcomings that will attend every other form of tax measure. But the main principle, with which I conclude, is this: The justice which we submitted to the American public for its acceptance or rejection, after having been accepted, was embodied in the bill, carried to the countrymen, and received their approval at every opportunity since then.

And here we must recall the obstructions of this first undertaking, which recorded this test of this bill before the world. Disturbed commerce, caused by the war in the Balkans—with Roumania, Servia, and Turkey—frightened money back to the war chests, reversing all advance in commerce, because of the fear of the great European nations that the flame lighted in the Balkan States would become a conflagration through the whole of Europe. Following this, and in the shadow of this obstruction, came our troubles in Mexico, with our borders aflame with revolution, with our Army and Navy forces on guard, and our commerce from our southern seas frightened by the prospect of continuous conflict. China followed in a new revolution following the installation of a Republic, to which was added the panic of famine. These cut off the prospect of commerce with that Asiatic zone. Then Japan, preparing for an expected conflict, having internal dissension, coupled with the charge of national fraud, which exhausted the treasury, likewise added the additional financial obstructions to the due test of the tariff measure. All this was but the beginning of the entrance into the great European holocaust, which in blood and death has finally stricken from the seas the vehicles of commerce from which we expected the contribution calculated upon at the time of the shaping and framing of our tariff bill. Our legislation was based upon the regular and normal conduct of nations as well as men. But fate played tricks with the calculation of statecraft, as with the world's hope of peace.

To the Senator and his colleagues who indict the Nation of America as a people misgoverned and who are invited to revolt against the Democratic administration that has guided it: Contemplate your country and search yourselves within and ascertain if there be not pride to be awakened when we view her station compared with the world. There are the great nations of Europe locked in death grapple; the blood of their children running red in rivers, the wails of mothers piercing the heavens, children dying of hunger, lands once classic and beautiful desolate and laid waste—fifty million dollars a day the estimate of their increasing indebtedness for fire and sword. Yet, previous to the war, France was indebted in excess of six billions of dollars; Germany, five billion; Russia, four billion five hundred million; Austria, three billion five hundred million; the United Kingdom of England, Ireland, Wales, and Scotland, three billion five hundred million; and blood dripping Belgium, seven hundred and fifty millions. Compare to this your own Nation, her industries active and prosperous, her commerce thriving and industrious, her people God-fearing and hopeful, her Nation at peace with the world, teaching liberty to mankind, furnishing an example of freedom and justice to the enlightenment of earth and to the salvation of man, with the single property of her railroads alone equal to the combined debt of these great countries which are weltering in each other's blood, while the national debt of this unparalleled America in June, 1913, was little in excess, in round numbers, of but a billion of dollars.

Here she stands—our country—the envy to-day of the earth and the guide of civilization, speaking the lessons of liberty and justice to mankind as she tenders herself as an example of what the creed of equality of man, justice to nations, and obedience to God can make of a people. Long may she stand, peaceful to all, extending her generous benefits to mankind everywhere and by her influence leading and guiding the children of earth to the eminence and glory of peace and happiness, the enjoyment of every American in this ill-fated hour to her sad rivals. Then let this be known, that however many there may be of those who, like the chaos of Beelzebub in the hell of Milton, would dishonor his nation's glory, deny her justice, and invite destruction upon their own people, that such may serve the devils of dissension and the disciples of dishonor, we the Democrats to-day are proud of the spectacle afforded by this, our country, and the achievements of the godly man who sits as President at the helm, tendering by day his services to mankind and by night offering his prayers to Heaven to bless his fellow men. In such presence we say unto such as you, if you shall continue your service in the cause of strife and confusion, that you may serve in the hell of hypocrisy, then, sad as may be your fate, pursue your task—it will meet its just penalty at the hands of those whom you attempt to deceive and who when aroused by your iniquity will work your just destruction. As for us in the democracy, we know that this which we serve is righteous, and in the presence of watchful mankind, beholding our deeds to men and our achievements for the Republic, we say to you in the words of Joshua, "Serve whom ye will, but as for us and our house we will serve the Lord."

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate more than a very few moments. I had not expected to address the Senate again—at least to-day—had it not been for the personal references of the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

I am sure our passages at arms have been indulged in with the greatest good humor; and certainly, so far as I am concerned, I can not contemplate the pulchritude of the Senator from Illinois with any sentiment but that of good humor. When, however, he devotes a large part of his discourse to what I have been compelled in the greatest good humor to designate as frivolity, in that it is an argument personal, an address ad hominem, and referring to my absence from the Chamber, it does not seem to me that he has measured up to the seriousness and the dignity of the careful statement which I submitted to the Senate.

I shall not refer to the absences of the Senator from Illinois. I have no information as to whether they were on the public business or in the pursuit of his private affairs. I know that they have been extensive. I also know, and it will be generally admitted by my colleagues who served with me in previous Congresses, that there has been no Senator more constant in his attendance or more industrious in the discharge of his duties than I have been during the 18 years I have been in this body, and more particularly during my present senatorial term. If I have been absent recently, it has been with the full knowledge and acquiescence of my constituents; and they have in fact urged me to be present in Pennsylvania and to leave a scene of activity where it is practically only permitted to the minority to vote.

My movements have been published for six months in every daily paper of importance in Pennsylvania and have been recorded before the people of the State. I have been mingling with them, and have gone before them in the full spirit of the new popular dispensation. It is going a long distance out of the way for the Senator from Illinois—a notorious absentee himself, notwithstanding the fact that he fills with dignity the statesmanlike position in his party of whip—to be injecting into the middle of a serious discourse matters which I can not but condemn as frivolous and unworthy of him.

I have no excuse to make for my absence. My constituents approve it, and I expect will vindicate it and the policies which I represent by an overwhelming majority in November. Why should any of the minority remain here?

We have heard many threadbare anteelection epithets in the annals of American politics. "Economy"—"economy"! What has become of "economy," and "the new freedom," and "the extravagance of the Republicans," and the "high cost of living," and "the burdens of taxes"? These and scores of other campaign terms, now unused or forgotten, run through my mind. After their uses are over they are thrown into the junk heap, almost too shabby and worn even to be expected to be of any use in any future campaigns. But if there was one thing that we did hear about it was the awful tyranny of Czar Reed, and the iniquities of Cannon, and the suppression of debate, and the evils of the caucus, so that Republicans were almost beginning to take these phrases as if they had some intrinsic truth, and they hesitated, in States and at the Capital here, to enter a caucus. It had to be conducted under the polite name of "conference"; and many persons gave a willing ear to the stories about the dreadful evils of political czars in the House of Representatives. Yet hardly had the Democracy gotten into power when a czarlike method of legislation is adopted which would make Speaker Reed turn in his grave, and make ex-Speaker Cannon look like a Progressive when he returns to Washington, as he will.

For days, for weeks, in the House of Representatives Democratic Members have sat in secret caucus behind closed doors legislating upon a tariff bill, the American public absolutely kept out of any knowledge of what was going on, no record kept of votes, members of the party dragooned and coerced, frequently against their conviction, on rates and schedules, in utter subversion of the spirit if not of the letter of the Constitution of the United States, which declares in effect that legislation shall be conducted in the open, that a record shall be kept, and a journal made of the proceedings. Just as the Republicans were being educated by our political opponents in the beatitudes of publicity, of the light of day, of the participation of the great American public in all legislative proceedings, even to the extent of having committee meetings open, and abolishing executive sessions, so that some men were so sensitive as to their political virtue that they hesitated to go into a room that the public was not surrounding in the galleries—after all this declamation of "the new freedom" we have the dark, secret caucus, lasting for weeks at a time, and perfecting legislation: and then, when the Republican minority in the House and the Senate, after days and weeks of weary waiting, not knowing what was going on, not knowing the nature of the various matters discussed, are summoned to a meeting of the House or Senate, they have handed to them the result of this caucus action, and they are told, and they have been told on more than one occasion on this floor: "Here, take this. Sit here from 10 or 11 in the morning until midnight, and pass this bill as we have framed it. We want no amendment; we invite no discussion. This is our ultimatum. You are simply here to see us register it. We do not want any information that you may have, as members of the minority, bearing upon these schedules. We intend to wear you out by physical exhaustion." No opportunity to study this voluminous measure, an encyclopedia of the industries of the Nation, but a long, continuous attendance from daylight until dark, and even until midnight, until the bill is passed—the verdict of a jury in a locked room. Is that any inducement to a member of the minority to participate continuously in the labors of the present Congress?

I came here to Washington a few days ago prepared to speak upon this measure. I have a number of things that I should like to submit to the Senate in addition to what I have said. I entered the Chamber, and I was informed that this august body must adjourn and hold no sessions for a day, perhaps for two days, maybe for a week, while the Democracy of the Senate retired to a dark room and there held their caucus on a bill imposing millions of direct taxes upon the American people. In all the record of the Republican Party I defy any Senator or anyone else to point to a condition approximating that, after all this folderol about publicity, and about "the new freedom," and about legislation in the open, and about the absence of any coercion or of any "boss orders," to use a general political term. I can inform the Senator from Illinois, as a member of the minority, that that is an additional reason. We have not in reality been given any opportunity to participate in the legislation which has been pending.

Nor do I take at any substantial value the statements of the Senator from Illinois that I have in any way discredited the industrial conditions of the country. Every statement which I read to the Senate came from a recognized trade journal, or from some well-known philanthropist, or from some gentleman prominent in industrial circles, and accepted as an authority. I did not indulge in generalities. I gave facts and figures of sheriffs' sales, receiverships, curtailments, and suspensions. These facts are apparent to all men. I accused no one of any deliberate purpose to precipitate this condition. I stated that it was the unfortunate result of what, in my opinion, are wrong and ill-conceived ideas as to economic and fiscal legislation as adapted to the American Republic.

The Senator from Illinois could have accompanied me last week on a trip through western Pennsylvania, when I was again absent from this body, and he could have seen the scores and the hundreds of men with bundles under their arms walking along by the highways of those western counties hunting employment, not knowing where they were going to sleep that night, not knowing where they would get a meal the following morning. I will take him any day into those western counties and show him a condition of blight and distress where a year ago there was an industrial paradise. I am exposing nothing that is not apparent to everybody, that is not well known to everybody. It can not be put off, and it is no sufficient answer to say that this condition is psychological, that it is unfair to refer to it, or that it is due to something else to which this economic legislation has no relation.

The American people know what they are confronted with. They do not need newspapers to tell them. They do not need arguments. From all I have heard, the city of Chicago, the great metropolitan center of the Senator's State, is as badly off as any other part of the country. Generalities will not be an answer to this vast army of unemployed, increasing as it is every day and every month, and likely to continue to increase with intensified conditions as long as the present political status is maintained.

I have nothing further to say. There is not an article in this pending tax bill, with the exception of the usual excise, which has already been referred to, that any Member of this body has received a single letter in behalf of or in commendation of. On the other hand, the condemnation from all over the country has been overwhelming. With the exception of that excise, there is not a single item which will not turn out to be in-quisitorial and burdensome and arouse a just resentment on the part of the American people.

This so-called emergency revenue bill will not be sufficient to preserve the Government from future deficits if present extravagances and present fiscal legislation continue as now, and I predict an additional tax bill or the issue of bonds to provide for the current expenses of the Government. There is not a dollar of this deficit that could not be provided for by tariff taxes which would relieve some of the industrial conditions now existing and would at the same time furnish adequate revenues to the Government.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, my very attractive and ubiquitous friend the Senator from Pennsylvania has now, in his speech replying to my answer to his first arraignment, indulged in the form of defense known as "You are another," and in certain forums, of course, that does apply. His intimation that I have been absent because of his confession of his own absence, I assure him, is based wholly upon misinformation. He has been informed, possibly, of some individual absence, such as that to which he referred. That was at midnight. My life is a little different from that of some of my friends. At midnight I am supposed to be in my own home, quietly reposing; and there I was found. I assure the Senator that my presence here has been daily witnessed, constant. I wanted to get away. I was anxious to get away. I would have gone if I could, and I am going to get away as soon as I can.

But now, Mr. President, apart from that personal matter, the able Senator addresses himself at considerable length to what he evidently regards as the deficiencies of the House of Representatives, its manner of doing business, its despotism in the conduct of its affairs. Of these matters I do not know. I am not a Member of the House of Representatives. The only thing I can observe is that the able Senator seems to be bleeding from wounds inflicted by a Member of the House by the name of PALMER, who, in a contest in Pennsylvania, if we read the papers aright, has no doubt left some impress upn my able friend; and he retaliates by making a general charge or accusation against the House of which that gentleman is a Member. Now, I am unable to defend the House, if it needed a defense, as I can not speak from knowledge; but I assume that at a proper time a reply to the observations, if they require any reply at all, will come from those better qualified from information.

Now, as to the Senate. I have heard the able Senator upon this floor denounce what he characterizes as "caucus rule," and I have heard him longingly implore the great graces of creation, wherever they are, against what he called then "close government" and "lack of publicity." Yet the able Senator forgets that no measure has been brought into this body that has not been out before the public, and all that the public desired to know obtained. The Senator says he knows no parallel. He forgets the manner in which the Payne-Aldrich-Smoot-Penrose measure had its incubation in this oven, and he likewise realizes how few hands were allowed to shape its destiny other than the favored few to whose keeping it was committed.

I say to the able Senator I will not make a response to observations about the Senate which records publicly the presence of the minority party. There were Members who were here. The Senator could not see them; he was absent. Not being able to see me, because I was here and he absent elsewhere, he assumes that I must be absent, because I was absent from him. The minority remained here and attended to its affairs as it saw its duty, and he did that which was according to his judgment as to his duty elsewhere. I merely recited the fact.

Now, Mr. President, the references of the Senator to the President, which seems to be a constant indulgence on the part of my able friend when all things are exhausted from his mind and nothing any longer occupies it, is but his favorite engagement—the assault upon the President. The Senator's reference to New Freedom and the New Era of Publicity is intended to elicit the observations that there was fraud perpetrated upon the American people.

Mr. President, in conclusion I have this thought to suggest to the able Senator: There was no legislation brought into this body that was not in direct compliance with the platform declaration, and then a vote of the American public upon those platform promises. We therefore assembled under the pledge to execute and to construct this form of legislation. The President of the United States took his solemn oath before high Heaven that he, too, would fulfill his obligation in imposing on this body and its collaborate body his sense of duty to comply with these promises to the American public, differing indeed from that other promise when the tariff bill was brought in here by alleging specific promises made to the public, when the promise and guaranty was given to revise downward, but when the officers were created that bill came in here, violating the provisions for the lack of proper stimulant on the part of the President; and there was the revising upward, to the barbarity of the method adopted and the persecution of the American public in the result.

Mr. PENROSE rose.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator is always very courteous about yielding, and I appreciate it. Does the Senator consider the Panama legislation as in compliance with the Democratic platform?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am complimented by the observation. I answer the Senator specifically. The Senator refers in his speech to an address made by the President of the United States touching the platform. This speech was made in New Jersey, in which speech there was a reference connected with the Panama Canal. The Senator would have left the impression that the President of the United States at that time made the allusion on the platform or that his own position was that there should be a charge of tolls. The President was referring in his speech at that time in New Jersey to the question of railroad-owned ships, to prevent a monopoly of canal and railroads in one single concentration; and the construction that has been given his address has been constantly and frequently and directly at variance with every object and purpose of the address under consideration.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator is leaving one subject and going to another. I see that the Senator is in some little difficulty and embarrassment in explaining it. We will probably drop that as a painful subject.

Mr. LEWIS. Believe me, there is nothing painful about my distinguished friend or anything he could suggest.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator is doing very well under the circumstances.

Mr. LEWIS. Under the circumstances it is difficult to do well and to find such agreeable to the Senator. In this matter let me answer the Senator to the point. I answer the Senator that he must treat the question as having been given for reply. In his suggestion in the matter of the charge of tolls, or rather the free tolls to certain forms of shipping, I repeat what I said, which is that no legislation has come into this body that has not been first considered by the public. On a few points asserted in the platform it may be said that subsequent events developed which called for a modification of the platform. These were called for because of happenings that did transpire before the eyes of the American public and from which they commanded this body and the other legislative body to act as the sense of justice required. What was done was in response to the popular needs as well as to the popular demands.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, one question, and then I am done. We will have to overlook these little deviations from party platforms, I suppose, but can we get an assurance that all the rest of the platform is to be complied with during the present administration—all the other pledges? Is the Senator in a position to assure the American people that every other pledge of the platform will be complied with?

Mr. LEWIS. This much I say, speaking only for myself, as I am not a guaranty of the conduct of others. If there could be less opposition and factious warfare from the opposing side, led by the distinguished Senator, against measures needed by the people and more cooperation to the response and demand from the ballot box, all things would be complied with as promised by the Democracy.

Mr. PENROSE. There is one feature of the Democratic platform that I am a very firm believer in, and I am on common ground with my Democratic associates in it, and that is one term for executive officers, one term for President of the United States. I would give no executive officer more than one term, even the sheriff or treasurer of a county. I think the old Roman people had that idea pretty well through their heads when they allowed their consul or any of their executive officers only one term. Now, can we have any definite assurance that the majority in control of legislation will bring it in? They could bring up the measure to-morrow, if they wanted, and have it acted on before adjournment. Can they give us any assurance that our aspirations and working for a one-term office will be gratified?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator, I am not aware, of course, of any of the conscientious scruples which may be possessed by the President. I do not know what his attitude of mind is, but this much I say to the Senator, since he has become wedded to the theory of a single one term for a public office, I can understand why he struggles to be returned term after term as Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator is omitting a material part of my statement. I said "executive officers." There has always, in all places, been a sharp distinction between an executive office, with its vast power of patronage, and the legislator, who has no power, who is one of a large number. That, in our experience, has always been accounted as preeminently a factor. That distinction, I admit, has been largely wiped out under the present administration because the executive and legislative functions have been combined in the Chief Executive of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator for a query, and he introduced an installment of some undisclosed, undeveloped manuscript.

Mr. PENROSE. I asked the Senator the specific question, Could we have any assurance as to whether there would be legislation providing for one term for the President of the United States? And he started to tell me something about what he thought the President might want.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to reply to the Senator specifically as to that. I think I can read the Senator's mind. Having a legitimate aspiration to the Presidency, which he feels might come to him from Pennsylvania, he desires to be assured now that his rival will not be Woodrow Wilson. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. I will be satisfied with one term.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, Mr. President, that feature of the platform, like anything else, will largely be decided, I dare say, by events as they largely control. I want to say to the Senator I had not finished the sentence when he interrupted me, by my permission, upon the question of the platform as to tolls. The Senator will not forget that the platform likewise denounced subsidies in any form, and a compliance with that part of the platform, amongst others, resulted in the expression of the legislation to which he refers.

In conclusion I must give to the able Senator one viewpoint of the President. I assume that the President of the United States felt when he gave his word to the country when he was elected a Representative at Large in behalf of the Nation, that he would aid any legislation according to the desires of the Nation. That he meant to execute that promise and that he could not, as had others in his place, sit silently and supinely in the White House and see his oath of office violated, his honor debased, as he allowed the needs of the Republic to be neglected and the pledges to the people violated, and this without constantly reminding his colleagues of his duty before the Nation, for his word had gone forth and his position was, in the language of the gentleman in the Merchant of Venice, "My word once gone forth can not be recalled. Must I lay perjury to my soul? No; not for Venice." And his position was: I can not ignore my duty nor violate my word of honor. No; not for office, how high, or position, how great.

Mr. President, with appreciation for the compliment of the patience of the Senate I take leave of this debate, secure in the confidence that the people only await their opportunity to vote their approval of the Democracy and their indorsement and praise of Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] if he will now request that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily?

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside in order that the Senator from Montana may take up the conference report on the Alaskan coal bill. After that has been disposed of I shall ask that the unfinished business be again proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the report of the conference committee on the bill H. R. 14233 be laid before the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the conference report on the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will in a very few words explain the present report which is before the Senate and the changes which have been made. The conferees in making the second report took as the basis the bill reported by the last report. This report is very much as the bill reported by the last report. There are some few changes to which I will call attention. If Senators who feel an interest in it will get the comparative print of the bill which was made on the last report, I can point out very easily the few changes that were made. I take the comparative print of the last report as the basis of my explanation. As I said, the bill reported by the last report is the basis of that report.

I will state the only changes which were made: On page 5 of the comparative print, right-hand column, in the second paragraph of the third column on page 5, after the word "corporation," the words "or municipality" are introduced and inserted in the present report. The object of that is to allow municipalities of the Territory of Alaska as municipalities to obtain the benefit of the proposed leases provided by the bill. It is to allow a municipality to be a lessee. The word "municipality" was in the House bill, but it was left out by the Senate. It was left out in the last report and at the request of the House conferees the conferees inserted it in the present report.

On page 7 of the comparative print, in the right-hand column, after the third line, the words "and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe" are omitted. They are omitted in obedience to the rule laid down by the Senate, because they constitute new matter. They were not in either the House or the Senate bill, and for that reason they were left out of this report.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERN in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator please refer to that again? I did not catch the place where it is found or what is the provision.

Mr. MYERS. On page 7 of the comparative print, in the third column, after the third line of section 5.

Mr. BORAH. "And under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe"?

Mr. MYERS. The words omitted are "and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe." The conferees thought there was wisdom in inserting those words, but as it was new matter, in obedience to the rule laid down by the Senate they eliminated them. We think, however, that they are covered by section 17 of the bill as reported by the last conference, which says—

> That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe the necessary and proper rules and regulations, and to do any and all things necessary to carry out and accomplish the purposes of this act.

We think that provision covers this instance quite well, and that these words may be omitted, as they have been, without any injury to the bill.

Down at the bottom of the same column, the third column, on page 7 of the comparative print, in the next to the last line, the words "one year" are changed to "two years." The House bill had it two years, and the House conferees wanted it to remain that way, and we acceded to their desire and made it two years. That is to conform to other parts of the bill which call for two years in some other matters of like character, and it makes it uniform.

On page 10 of the comparative print the conferees, at the end of the first paragraph, third column, inserted the revenue amendment which was offered in the Senate by my colleague [Mr. WALSH] and adopted by the Senate. It will be found in the middle of the column of that page, beginning, in the eighth line, with the word "All." It reads:

> All net profits from operation of Government mines, and all royalties and rentals under leases as herein provided, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States in a separate and distinct fund to be applied to the reimbursement of the Government of the United States on account of any expenditures made in the construction of railroads in Alaska, and the excess shall be deposited in the fund known as the Alaska fund, established by the act of Congress of January 27, 1905, to be expended as provided in said last-mentioned act.

That was not in the House bill, but the House conferees very readily agreed to accept it as it was passed by the Senate, and we put it in the report.

I will say that that amendment, I think, at the first conference hardly received the consideration which was due it. The conferees apparently did not give it the full significance to which it is entitled. When it came up, something was said by some of the conferees to the effect that the Alaskan railway act provided practically the same thing and that there was no use of repeating it here. But the conferees seemed to have, without much investigation, adopted that assurance or suggestion and struck it out accordingly, but after it was stricken out, after the last report had been made, the conferees examined the Alaskan railway act more carefully and realized that the provision of the Alaskan railway act is not just the same and is not as satisfactory, and the Senate having declared that they wanted the provision in the bill we very gladly and cheerfully put it in by unanimous consent of the conferees. We feel that it is a wise provision and that it makes the bill better.

On page 12 of the comparative print, in the third column, at the bottom of the column, the last paragraph, beginning with the word "Provided," which is the provision for court procedure, which was the basis of so much objection in the Senate and which was characterized and determined to be new matter, the conferees omitted altogether. They struck that out in obedience to the will of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the entire paragraph, beginning with the words "Provided, That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease," is left out?

Mr. MYERS. That is left out. It is new matter, and we had nothing to do but leave it out. At least, the Senate decided that it was new matter. In lieu of that, going to the middle of the column, we took so much of section 14 of the Senate bill as was put in the last report. The first paragraph of section 14 was kept in the old report. The second paragraph was left out of the former report, but the second paragraph was passed by both the House and the Senate substantially, and upon objection that the conferees had no right to leave out anything which in substance had passed both the House and the Senate, the second paragraph of section 14 was reinserted.

So section 14 of the Senate bill, both the first and second paragraphs, is now in this report as the court section, the section which provides how disputes may be disposed of and controversy may be adjudicated. It is a Senate provision, just as it passed the Senate without any change. The House conferees receded and accepted the Senate section on that subject.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, then, section 14, just as it appears in the comparative print in the second column, is now in the bill.

Mr. MYERS. It is. It is the Senate provision. Turning over to the next page, page 13 of the comparative print——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Before the Senator leaves that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The concluding paragraph of section 14 of the Senate bill reads:

> And the lease may provide for the enforcement of other appropriate remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof.

Is that left in the conference report?

Mr. MYERS. It is. It was put back, rather. We had no alternative when those words, substantially as they appear here, passed both the House and the Senate. Under the construction of the Senate we had no right to leave them out, and they were put back.

Turning to the next page, page 13 of the comparative print, I will ask attention to the blank space near the bottom, just after section 16, between section 16 and section 17 in the last report. If you will look at the middle of the column and look at the second paragraph of section 16, middle column, you will find these words:

> And any person making false oath, representation, or report shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

Those words were substantially in both the House and the Senate bill. They were left out of the last report. During the course of the conference there was some suggestion made that the general criminal law covering Alaska covered that and there was no use of putting it in here, but none of the conferees had any objection to it, and it having been put in by both the House and the Senate it is put back. So section 16, third column, is now made section 16, second column, in its entirety, without any elimination. It is the Senate provision. The House conferees accepted it, and it goes into the report just as the Senate passed it.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator what has become of section 15 in the second column? Was that eliminated entirely?

Mr. MYERS. Section 15, second column, was eliminated by the last report and remains eliminated; it is out. I am enumerating just what was put back; nothing else.

Those are all the changes that have been made. I have enumerated them. They are very few. They may be recapitulated by saying that the amendment offered in the Senate by my colleague [Mr. WALSH] and adopted by the Senate, the revenue section, providing specifically for the revenues, leaving out such matter as was determined to be absolutely new matter and reinserting a couple of paragraphs that I have enumerated as matter that was passed by both the House and the Senate and was left out, is now put back.

The changes I have enumerated are all the changes that have been made Other than those changes, the bill as reported back by this report is just the same as the bill reported by the last report.

I think the conferees—the majority of them, at any rate—think the bill has been made better by going back to the conference and being reported the second time. I feel very positively and strongly that the bill as now reported is a better bill than it was as reported before, and is more in accordance with the determination of the Senate. It is more in accord with the bill as it was passed by the Senate.

I think the wisdom of the Senate in sending the bill back to the conferees has resulted in good. It has resulted in the improvement of the bill and the benefit of the subject matter of legislation. Personally, I am glad that the bill went back to the conferees, because I think they have done better work and have made an improvement in it. With that, I submit the report to the Senate.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I have no desire to be factious or to impose my opinions and judgments on the Senate simply for factiousness' sake. If we are to have a leasing bill, this may be a good bill; but, as I have said before, I am utterly and positively opposed to the whole policy and principle of leasing these coal lands. The lands are ours. We have gone through experiences enough in this country from the days of the Homestead strike until the days of the West Virginia and Colorado strikes, I think, to prompt prudent men to set their faces against the policy of leasing these lands. The lands in West Virginia are leasehold lands, from nonresident miners, who are exploiting them for their own purposes and their own gain and their own greed. Colorado is in much the same condition. We have similar conditions in Pennsylvania in very many instances.

I insist, Mr. President, that coal is a prime necessity of life. We can not get along without coal. It is all very well, you tell us, and that we have myriads of tons of coal. I heard the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] say that in Colorado they have enough coal to last the present population for a hundred years.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state that Colorado has sufficient coal to furnish the world with coal at the present rate of consumption for 300 years.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I mistook what the Senator said. But the Senator is taking the present population. We are not going to stand still. This great country to-day has approximately very close to a hundred million people and it is growing with leaps and bounds each year in population. Our consumption of coal will naturally increase. Three hundred years, the Senator says. Well, after all, 300 years is but a day in the life of a great nation. I anticipate and trust in God that this country will last longer than 300 years. Mind you, when a ton of coal is burnt it is utterly and absolutely destroyed. It can not be brought back or resuscitated in any form. It is unlike wood. Wood produces ashes, and potash is a fertilizer. From coal it is of no value whatever except to fill a hole in the earth.

I say such a policy would be dangerous and disastrous. I believe wise legislation demands that this great deposit, made by Providence, the eternal God, for our welfare and the welfare of our people, should be husbanded, maintained, taken care of, and worked prudently for the well-being of the whole people. While, of course, coal grows, it grows by such an infinitely slow process that for all purposes we may say that coal in a practical way does not increase in amount.

I fear this measure will pass; but there is a strong public sentiment against it. The argument that this is undertaking business upon the part of the Government I admit is true; but the world has changed and the public mind has changed marvelously within the last 25 years on this matter. There has been Government buildings and Government construction. We have constructed the Panama Canal; we are maintaining it; and we are carrying on business of all kinds on that strip of 10 miles in width in Panama to satisfy the objects, demands, and wants of an intelligent and progressive people.

I say this legislation is to my mind a black mark, a cloud, on our progress. I know full well the great interests are behind and are pressing this measure. I do not mean to say that Senators who are here pressing it are governed by anything other than laudable motives; but I do say that it would be a disaster and a wrong, amounting almost to a crime, to further fix a leasing system in Alaska. It would be to transplant from this part of our continent to Alaska the uncanny and outrageous system that has prevailed in West Virginia. I do not urge that to stir up the feelings of my friend the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], but the outrageous system that prevails there, which has led to riot, disorder, and bloodshed, with no profit to anybody, and a system that is in progress in Colorado as well.

As this Territory is ours, in God's name, Mr. President, do not let this Nation give up this prime necessity, coal, which belongs to us in this our land, over which we have made an appropriation of $50,000,000 to build a railroad. I adjure you, for the welfare of the people of this land and for the credit of the great body which the Senator and I in part represent, do not allow this coal land to go into private hands under a possible absentee lease-holding system. I shall vote against the proposition.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, notwithstanding some very objectionable features have been removed from this bill since it was last before the Senate, I can not give it my support. Having heretofore discussed the measure somewhat at length, I do not intend to do so now. I intend only to reaffirm what I then said on the subject.

The most favorable view that can be taken of this legislation and the system which it inaugurates is that it is experimental. That being the case, it should be treated as experiments usually are—by first trying them out in a limited way, and, if found to be desirable, to adopt them permanently. That is not the course pursued here. On the contrary, at least one-half of the coal lands of Alaska are thrown open to lease for a term of 50 years. We are hazarding an empire on the venture. Its authors should at least have followed the precedent heretofore adopted by Congress when it devoted portions of the public domain to internal improvements by reserving to the Government alternate tracts. This could easily have been done in this experiment and still have given ample opportunity for the development sought to be accomplished by its friends. Then, if the scheme should have proven beneficial, the public would have shared in the benefits.

I do not question the motives of those who are pressing this legislation; on the contrary, I am sure they are patriotic, and I am also confident that they sincerely believe in the wisdom of the policy they are inaugurating; but I am just as sure they are mistaken in their view. Therefore I shall vote against this measure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I differ from the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] as to the best system to adopt for the development of the coal lands of Alaska. I do not share the apprehensions which he entertains that the coal lands of the world will be soon exhausted. It is true that, according to the Geological Survey of the United States Government, the total amount of coal in the State of Colorado is 371,000,000,000 tons, which is enough to supply the world at the present rate of consumption for 300 years. I will also state to the Senator that the State of Wyoming, to the north of Colorado, has still greater coal fields. It has been estimated by the same Geological Survey that there is enough coal in the State of Wyoming to supply the entire world for more than 425 years. It has been further estimated that there is enough coal in the United States to supply the entire world for 5,000 years. When you take into consideration that there are other coal fields in the world, that China has large coal fields, it seems to me that the supply is practically inexhaustible, at least within the range of years during which we should reasonably guard against its consumption.

Mr. President, the coal question has been agitated by the alarmists, and that agitation has made a great many believe that there was danger of a coal famine, but from statements made by the authorities of this Government it is clear that there is no danger of any such exhaustion. Alaska herself, according to the estimate of the same bureau, has 115,000,000,000 tons of coal, sufficient to supply the world for nearly 100 years, and enough to supply the entire Pacific coast, which consumes less than a million tons a year, for more than 1,000 years. So the theory that we are all going to freeze to death soon is not substantiated by the figures that are furnished by geologists, and which they report to the United States Geological Survey.

Mr. President, I have opposed this bill not that I have any interest in Alaska, but because she has no representative on the floor of this body, no one to state the conditions that exist there.

I am very much interested in the bills that are to come before the Senate at the next session, especially in the bills for the application of the leasing system to almost all of the natural resources of the public domain in the States of the Union. I am convinced that such bills, if they are passed, will be followed by leasing bills for our mineral lands, because the conservation congresses have repeatedly asserted that that is their object. Further than that, you will find that these measures will be defended upon the very ground and upon the same principle on which this coal-leasing bill is defended.

Mr. President, I have sought in the argument upon this measure before the Senate to show that it was inconsistent with our form of government that we should have a leasing system, because it keeps lands in perpetuity in the Federal Government. That was never intended by the framers of our Constitution, nor is it in line with our theory of government. That being the case, I propose to vote against the conference report, as I did vote against the bill.

Mr. President, what effect has the principle of perpetual ownership by the Government of land in Alaska? Perpetual ownership of lands by the Federal Government means exemption from taxation forever. That means that upon an insignificant quantity of lands in private ownership, you must levy assessments and taxes for the purpose of maintaining government. I think, if this bill shall pass and its policies shall be permanently maintained, that Alaska can bid farewell forever to any hopes of statehood. Why? Because Alaska has only one-fiftieth of 1 per cent of its area in private ownership. One five-thousandth part of the total area of Alaska is in private ownership. When she knocks at the door for admission into the Union, what will be said to her? The same that has been said to every Territory that has applied, namely, what are your resources and wealth? How can you maintain a State government? What are your assessment rolls? When it has simply the right to tax one-fiftieth of 1 per cent of the property within its borders, it is impossible to maintain State government; it is impossible to have a school system; it is impossible to have county governments. Thus by the passage of this bill you will retard, nay, it seems to me, you will make it impossible for Alaska ever to attain statehood. Yet these are our own people; they are Americans; they have gone through the hardships of pioneer life to settle and develop that country. To keep those lands in Federal ownership forever means that you can never raise money upon them to maintain statehood and the subsidiary divisions of government that go with statehood. Mr. President, this very act is the measure that will retard the growth of population and wealth in Alaska, because it prevents the acquisition of property by which taxes can be raised with which to support government.

Mr. President, poor Alaska has had a severe trial with the leasing system. I want to read you a statement which was presented by the committee of the American Mining Congress, which reported upon the system of leasing coal and other public lands as proposed for Alaska. It is as follows:

> Poor old Alaska has surely had quite enough of the leasing system. It was leased by Russia from 1799 until 1867 to the Russian-American Co. That company was the absolute lord and master, and its leasehold sovereignty absolutely prevented development. Fortunately, nobody was lured there under false premises. Only those went there who did so for the Russian-American Co. A leasing system was not inflicted upon honest, hardy pioneers as is now proposed by the American Government. Fortunately for the United States, Alaska was not colonized or settled by the Russians. Their leasing system prevented it. Otherwise the Russian people would have so well developed Alaska by 1867 that the United States could not have bought it for 2 cents an acre, with its wonderful fisheries and a fur-seal herd of 6,000,000 thrown into the bargain. The first thing we did, however, was to lease that seal herd to a company which in 40 years made a net profit of $5,738,000 and depleted the seal to about 75,000. In the meantime the United States Government spent more money in patroling the seal islands than it obtained from royalties on the lease, and Alaska got absolutely nothing, not a cent in taxation, not a lighthouse, not a schoolhouse, not as much as a flagpole.

Mr. President, that is a terrible arraignment of what has occurred there. Now, we propose by this legislation to force another leasing system upon the people of that Territory against their will. We tried the experiment of leasing the lead mines of the United States in 1807, yet we found that we paid $4 for inspection and the collection of the royalties for every dollar collected.

Mr. President, this bill provides for the withdrawal of coal lands. It is to be followed by other measures of a similar nature. A bill has been reported, or is pending in the committee, providing that there shall be subject to lease all sodium lands, phosphate lands, asphaltum lands, oil lands, and other lands. Logically there will follow a leasing system applied to the resources of the entire public domain.

This bill as it came from the House provided that there should be two distinct pieces of coal lands reserved to the United States; one, I think, of about 6,000 acres and the other of about 7,000 acres. There was added by the Senate a provision reserving to the United States one-half of all the other coal lands in Alaska to be withdrawn not only from entry and sale but from even leasing. Oh, Mr. President, it seems to me that we who know something of the disadvantages of withdrawing lands from entry, must recognize that in this act there are the seeds of discontent and irritation which will continually grow among the citizens of the Territory of Alaska.

There was one man in the American Mining Congress who made a speech as to the reservations which have already been made there, to which I wish to call attention. He said:

> Alaska is being literally reserved to death. We have forest reserves, military reserves—one of them 100 miles in diameter—coal reserves, fish reserves, naval reserves, missionary reserves, church reserves, school reserves, seal reserves, bird reserves, and, I suppose, by this time, bug reserves and cranks crying for more reserves.

Mr. President, it does seem, from the enumeration of the reserves which have actually been made, that Alaska is truly being reserved to death; and yet, right in the face of that, there comes a proposition in this bill to reserve to the Federal Government about two-thirds of the coal lands of Alaska and to withdraw them from occupation and development even under a leasing system. In one sweeping declaration it is provided that one-half of all the rest of the coal lands shall be reserved to the Government. How can you develop a country under such circumstances?

Mr. President, the people of Alaska do not want a leasing system. I have not heard of a single man who said that he wanted such a system. It might be that they would be willing to have a leasing system imposed upon them if they could not under any circumstances secure legislation granting the right of entry and purchase as it exists now in other portions of the United States; but when we know that orders of withdrawal can be canceled; that it will take only a few minutes to issue such an order and allow the miners to go to work in Alaska it seems to me that the simple way is the entry and sale system under which this Nation came to be the most wealthy and powerful of all the countries of the world.

Mr. President, Secretary Fisher went to Alaska during his administration of the Interior Department. Of course there is a feeling of natural pride among citizens and hearty welcome to a Cabinet officer when he goes to a distant portion of the Republic. He is greeted with hospitality and silence is maintained concerning his policies that may be in conflict with the views of the people of the Territory. Yet these men were possessed with the ideals of liberty and freedom, and they wanted Secretary Fisher to understand their position as to the coal-leasing proposition entertained by him. So they met him at Valdez and they presented to him resolutions upon the subject unanimously adopted. Among those resolutions we find the following:

> The leasing system is unanimously opposed in Alaska, because it is un-American, and, further, because it would intensify rather than diminish the chances of monopoly. None but wealthy corporations could do anything with a lease and they would demand concessions unlikely to be granted, and which, if granted, would license monopoly. The leasing dream would mean indefinite postponement of coal mining in Alaska.

Mr. President, the Alaskans are the ones most vitally affected, they are the ones who will be the victims if monopoly prevails. Why not, in the determination of a policy which so vitally affects their happiness and welfare, heed their warning and request?

Mr. President, what is government for? The chief end and object of government is the happiness of its citizens. Are we going to put upon them a system which they abhor—a system which experience has shown has not been for the benefit of the people of the United States?

What was the old leasing system? A thousand years ago it was universal in Europe. It was then called feudalism, and under it the men who held the lands, held them by a leasehold estate and not by a freehold estate. When a man attained that prominence where he could assert the fact that he did not have to pay rent and did not have to contribute to the defense of his high lord, then he became known as a freeholder. It was an honor to rise from being a vassal to be a freeholder. So, when our forefathers came to America, abhoring the idea of landlordism and vassalage, they recognized that the freehold principle was the true principle upon which to found a free and independent Republic. There have been tabulations made as to the development of this country which show that with only 6 per cent of the area of the world and only 6 per cent of the population of the world we produce more than one-third of the minerals and coal of the world. With that kind of development, with that great advance, is it possible that we are now to go back upon the very principles that have produced that great result?

Mr. President, there are some things in the bill which I do not feel are for the best interests of the people. I believe that the royalties that are exacted in Alaska should not go to the United States Government, if there are any royalties to be paid.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Colorado?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to say that under the amendment offered in the Senate by my colleague [Mr. WALSH] and adopted by the Senate, the royalties and all profits from the leases will go, first, to pay for the expenses of building the Alaskan railway, and, after that, will go into what is known as the "Alaska fund" for the exclusive benefit of Alaska, for the purpose of building roads, schoolhouses, and other improvements in the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, when we voted for the Alaska railroad we had no right to say that all Alaska should contribute to that railroad. The railroads which are built through my State get their return and are able to pay their bonded indebtedness from the imposition of traffic rates. Those rates affect the people who were benefited by the construction of the railroad. What interest has a coal miner or other citizen in one part of Alaska, a thousand miles away, in that railroad? How can he be benefited by the construction and operation of it? Why should his coal mine be required to pay a royalty to reimburse the expenditures for its construction? When we pick out one locality for an improvement and without the consent of the people there make the entire Territory contribute to the improvement, then, Mr. President, we are doing a wrong; and I can not help believing that the requirement that the money derived from leases of coal lands in Alaska should go to any other people than the people of Alaska is an injustice to them and is not a compliance with the trust which has been reposed in the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, I object to the action of the conferees in striking out the provisions granting to citizens injured the right to sue the Government of the United States. I feel that the provision in regard to that matter in the Senate bill was much better than the provision in the House bill or the provision in the pending conference report. It seems to me every American ought to repudiate the idea that the Government should take advantage of the doctrine that the king can do no wrong. I can not understand why, if a man has been injured, he can not sue the Government. We have had an illustration in the State of Colorado that is very plain and clear. In the San Luis Valley there is a tract of land of more than 1,000,000 acres. Filings were made for reservoirs and for ditches under the laws of the United States and the State; and yet by reason of an order made by the Secretary of the Interior 16 years ago they have been unable to proceed with the development of the valley. The rights of way have never been granted, and consequently that valley, rich in everything except water, has lain a barren waste. We have begged for years to have the United States Government sue some of those who are attempting to avail themselves of the laws as to rights of ways and the appropriation of water for beneficial uses, but we could not get the Government to bring suit.

Now, there is pending upon the Senate calendar a bill introduced by my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] providing that the State of Colorado, or some of the persons who have rights under the laws which existed in the United States and in the State, shall be permitted to sue the United States Government for the purpose of determining their water rights. Under the conditions which have existed for some time the Government of the United States is absolutely taking water which, according to all laws, belongs to prior appropriators or to those who have initiated their right for the appropriation of water for beneficial uses.

Mr. President, if this right is given, it may be said that a number of suits will be brought; but is it possible that a great and powerful Nation wants to hide behind the fact that it is a sovereign and let the people suffer because they can not enforce their rights? That provision of the bill as it passed the Senate was much better than the provision of the conference report.

A leasing system has never paid. It did not pay from 1807 up to 1847, when it was repealed. It does not pay now, so far as it is carried out in the administration of the Forestry Service. Every year we appropriate $3,000,000 for that service more than we get out of the forests from sales of timber and grazing taxes, although the rents have been raised for grazing purposes to the extent in some parts of the country of more than 700 per cent above what they were when the system was inaugurated. It was an endeavor upon the part of the Forest Service to make the service pay, but the overhead charges, as the railroads call them, and the amounts required to pay the salaries of the large number of men employed in the Forestry Service have always exceeded the amount of money which can be collected. So it will be in the case of Alaska. You will find that this very system will fail to bring any net returns. Of course the United States Government is rich and can afford, if it wants to do so, to pay to the Forestry Service $3,000,000 a year in excess of what it collects, and it can pay in the case of Alaska $3,000,000 a year in excess of what it realizes from the royalties which will be collected; yet, Mr. President, that very thing shows the impracticability of the proposition. We will find that the Government can not undertake a leasing system and make it a success.

Mr. President, I believe that the withdrawal by the conference committee of the part of the Senate bill which limits to 5 cents a ton the amount to be charged as royalty was wrong. There is no telling what the amount of royalty may be, and every time an increased amount of royalty is added to a ton of coal it hampers commerce. It must be borne by the consumer to the extent of two or three times the amount of the royalty. It is going to be a continual discrimination against the industries of Alaska and against the development of that country. It is a charge which never has been made against any other Territory. If other Territories had been charged with a royalty, then there might be some excuse for it, but none has ever been exacted. Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, clear to the Rocky Mountain line, have gotten the benefit of all their natural resources. It seems to me that to take that far-distant country, where pioneering is most difficult and distressing, and to say that it shall be made to pay something that no other State in the Union in its Territorial days was required to pay is something that is wrong.

In the United States there is no monopoly of coal—or, at least, of bituminous coal—which runs almost all of the industries of the United States. A comparison with the countries that have governmental leasing systems demonstrates that we get coal in the United States now, according to the Geological Survey, at the mouth of the mine for an average of $1.11 a ton and in West Virginia for 90 cents a ton. No other country in the world that has a leasing system gets anywhere near as cheap coal as that. In Nova Scotia it is $2.01; in New South Wales, $1.82; in New Zealand, State mine, $2; in Victoria, State mine, $2.28; and in West Australia, $2.22 per ton.

Why do you say that we are attempting to control monopoly by this legislation? This has nothing to do with monopoly. Monopoly may exist under a leasing system just as well as under ownership of property. Any tendency toward monopoly arises from the attempt to control the transportation and market of the product, not the production. Take the American Smelting & Refining Co. It does not operate mines to any appreciable extent. It busies itself with the treatment of the ore. Take the Standard Oil Co. It may have a few wells, but not many. It has control of the pipe lines and has such great capital as to be able to make contracts in restraint of trade. That is why there is no effort made to control the product itself before it is brought forth from the ground. We have never heard anything of a monopoly in the mining of precious metals. All over the country there are thousands and thousands of miners, but we have never heard of a combination among them.

So, Mr. President, there is not a tendency in ownership to make monopoly, nor could there be, from the vast quantity of our natural resources; but Alaska has done one thing—or, at least, the United States Congress did it for her—it has passed a law which is the best law against monopoly in the world, and if that law is observed and enforced there can be no such thing as monopoly in Alaska. I regret very much that we have not in the United States the same provision. It reads as follows:

> If any of the lands or deposits purchased under the provisions of this act shall be owned, leased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device, permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form part of or in any way effect any combination, or are in anywise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, mortgage, stock ownership or control, in excess of 2,560 acres in the District of Alaska, the title thereto shall be forfeited to the United States by proceedings instituted by the Attorney General of the United States in the courts for that purpose.

It seems to me that under that law, making a forfeiture of title and imposing penalties for any combination to acquire lands in excess of 2,560 acres, the laws of Alaska right now are better safeguarded than the laws of any other country on the Western Hemisphere.

So, Mr. President, I want to say that I am opposed to this leasing proposition. I think it is wrong. I think it is productive of a feeling and irritation that defeats the chief end of government in the localities affected. I feel that the United States Government has started on a policy of sale of its public domain which has produced such great development that to return now to a leasing system will produce depression and stagnation and will retard that development which we have so much hoped would be the result of this legislation.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, just a word. Notwithstanding the Senator tells us about how well this bill is safeguarded and how much coal they have in Alaska—enough to last the entire world 300 years, as he says—the fact remains that poor humanity in my part of the world pays $7 a ton for it. Somebody is making an uncanny and an unfair profit on it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; and the cause of it is that you have not the laws enforced to prevent contracts in restraint of trade.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is all very well to tell the people what is the cause of it. The dire situation is that they pay $7 a ton, or go without heat with which to keep their bodies warm or fuel with which to cook their food.

I am conscientious in my position on this matter, and I believe our friends on the other side may be just as conscientious. I will not aid or abet, so far as my vote is concerned, a measure of this kind. I know there is a powerful sentiment abroad in this country against the further leasing away for a paltry 4 cents a ton, as your bill says, of this great deposit, the beneficent handiwork of our God for humanity's welfare and blessing. Never, never, will I vote to aid such a process.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator pleases, just a second there. Is it fair to charge monopoly against a product unless monopoly exists there?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It has not yet had the chance to get there.

Mr. SHAFROTH. When coal is produced in West Virginia at 90 cents a ton, and the average of coal in the United States is $1.11 a ton, and it is sold to you at $7 a ton, is it possible that that can be charged up against the mine? It must be charged against the people who manipulate it in transportation.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes; but I desire primarily that these people shall not have the opportunity so to manipulate it. Since we have this coal, why, in the name of Heaven, shall we give it away? Why not try some other process? We tried it in West Virginia, we tried it in Pennsylvania, we tried it in Colorado, and the result has been murder, bloodshed, poverty, misery, and woe to every man who was engaged in it except the man who sits in yonder great metropolis, in New York, stuffing his coffers with the result of their labor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, that can be done under a leasing system as well as under an ownership system; and the Senator must recognize the fact that when coal is produced at an average price in the United States of $1.11 a ton, and 90 cents a ton in West Virginia, there can not be sustained a charge of monopoly in the production of the coal.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, the genial Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] and myself are at one in our votes on this bill, but as far apart as the poles on the reasons for those votes.

The Senator from New Jersey asks, in the last moment of the colloquy, "As we own this coal, for heaven's sake why do we give it away?" I take the position now that the United States does not own a foot of the coal land of the United States for commercial purposes; neither does it own an acre of the public land of the United States for commercial purposes. It is an owner simply as a trustee for the people, and to the man who puts to usefulness an acre of the public land or of the coal land belongs the usufruct.

But, Mr. President, I am not going to discuss this bill. I am not at all concerned in regard to the details of it. I simply rise to enter my protest against entering upon a system of landlordism in this country. It makes no difference whether the Government of the United States or my neighbor is my landlord; the minute I become a tenant I cease to be a free citizen of this great Republic; and when you put the people of Alaska under tenantry you remove from them every incentive to become real citizens of this country.

I remember a debate years ago upon this very subject, when the lamented Senator from Montana, Mr. Carter, was discussing it. "Ah," said he, "a man will take his shotgun to defend his home, but a man seldom is impelled to take his shotgun to defend a boarding house." The people of this country must own their homes, they must own that upon which their industry centers, if you are going to have a real citizenship in this country; and if this vote shall be favorable to this bill, I for one shall not accept it as a precedent for any future legislation along these lines.

I rose to enter a further protest from the fact that this legislation is sought and demanded under false pretenses. It has been urged here, urged in the other House of Congress, and urged through the press—the great metropolitan newspapers and the magazines—that we must pass this bill, so that the people of Alaska can have coal wherewith to warm themselves. Mr. President, legislation is not needed for that. If the Executive of this country, if the Interior Department, will enforce the laws in regard to Alaska that are now upon the statute books, the coal fields will be opened, the coal can be mined. It is not kept back by those who are opposing a leasing system. The development of that country, so far as its coal is concerned, is not kept back by those who object to having the Government hand laid upon all their industries. It is kept back by the strong arm of the Executive of this Nation, which suspends at will the act of Congress under which these coal lands may be disposed of.

So I say that this whole propaganda is a propaganda carried on under false pretenses. The fact that the people of Alaska are without coal to-day should be laid where it properly belongs—not upon those who are opposing this sort of legislation, but upon those who by the acts of Executive authority suspend the act of Congress, as they have a right to do under the authority given by us.

Just one other matter. I will not be drawn into a discussion of this withdrawal matter now, but I want to say to my friends who believe in this sort of legislation that if you could see the condition that exists in some of our Western States because of legislation of like character, and because of Executive orders of like character, you would not vote for this legislation. In my own county—my own county, mind you—there is withdrawn from occupation, withdrawn from sale, withdrawn from opportunity of taxation, withdrawn from all source of revenue, an area of land greater than the whole State of Massachusetts. What county can prosper under those conditions? The county is compelled to keep up the roads, the schoolhouses, the bridges, and have nine-tenths of its area under the withering hand of Government control—a control that will not and can not be released.

If Senators could see those conditions and realize them, they would not wonder at the earnestness with which some of these propositions are opposed.

Mr. President, I simply want to protest against the passage of this legislation, because I know that it is but the entering wedge that shall finally cleave its way through the whole Rocky Mountain region and through every Rocky Mountain State. There is not a resource of all those States, barring the precious metals only, but that is now locked up under the strong arm of the Government. Not an oil field can be discovered but that immediately the Government of the United States takes it out of active operation. Not a coal field can be discovered but that the Government at once reaches out and closes it to the entry of him who would develop it. Not a resource except the precious metals remains.

I suppose this conference report will be agreed to; but I want to make my protest here and now, and enter it upon the record, that it shall not and must not be considered as a precedent for legislation of like character that may be sought to be imposed upon the sovereign States of the Rocky Mountain region.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I shall occupy the attention of the Senate for a moment, and a moment only.

I regret very much, of course, that this leasing bill did not retain section 18, which provided for the repeal of section 16 of the act known as the reclamation extension act; but I presume the conferees did the best they could with that provision, and I shall not undertake to delay the passage of the bill by reason of that fact. I am assured by all that we are to have assistance in the repeal of section 16 at a more opportune time.

I presume, if we are going to have a leasing system, that in all probability the details of this bill, soon to become a law, are as acceptable as any original bill could be made. In other words, necessarily, there will have to be changes as experience is had and practice under the leasing system is put in vogue. This bill as it now stands for a leasing system, however, does not meet with any serious objection upon my part. I only want to say that I am opposed to the leasing system in its entirety. I am not an advocate of public ownership of public utilities generally, but I do not hesitate to say that I prefer to try public working of the mines to that of leasing the mines. There would be some hope of serving the people by cheaper fuel under the former system. There is no hope of giving them cheaper coal under the leasing system.

I sincerely hope this bill will result in opening up Alaska. I sincerely hope it will bring prosperity to those people up there and give them an opportunity to develop that great country and to make out of it what its natural resources justify us in believing it could be made. My judgment, however, first, is that it will not result in the development of Alaska; secondly, that it will not result in giving any cheaper fuel to Alaska or the Pacific coast; and, thirdly, that it will not prove satisfactory to the Government. That, however, is not due to the fact of the particular terms of the bill. It is due, in my judgment, to the principle involved in the whole leasing system.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] stated the amount of coal which it is supposed Colorado contains within her coal beds, and the amount of coal which may be found in the coal beds of Wyoming, and the amount of coal, generally, which may be found in the United States, supposedly sufficient to satisfy the demand of the world for the next 5,000 years. The only question left is how to get that indispensable fuel to the people at a reasonable price; because, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] has said, while these vast coal fields are there and this vast supply is at hand, the people very close to those coal fields are paying exorbitant prices for the coal. There is but one question connected with this entire proposition, and that is not the keeping of the coal in the ground or conserving it in the sense that you are locking it up for all time to come, depriving this generation and the succeeding generation of the use of it, but the sole and only question is as to how to get the coal to the consumer at a price which he can afford to pay, or which, in justice and conscience, he ought to pay.

That being true, Mr. President, how is it possible from any system of reasoning to arrive at the conclusion that you can put coal down to the consumer upon which is paid a large royalty, and upon which a leasing system is operative, cheaper than it is put down under the system heretofore obtaining, or under Government ownership and Government operation of the mine? My opinion is that if the Government can not successfully operate the mine, the same reasoning with additional force will show that a leasing system would be unsuccessful, and that they could not put down the coal to the consumer as cheaply as private ownership.

But back of all this question is this question for the West; and we had just as well face the proposition and understand that that is going to be the result. That is, that the vast fields of the West are to be withheld from private ownership and from home building, from taxation, and put under a leasing system.

That seems all right for those who are not there to see its effect. It seems to be, upon theory and upon paper, a very practical and safe and sane system; but the State which I have the honor in part here to represent has about one-third its area in Government ownership now, withdrawn from entry by the private citizen. I do not complain at all as to the withdrawal of any acre of that vast domain which is purely timberland and exclusively dedicated by the God of nature to the growing of timber; but the evils of this system are accentuated by the fact that while they withdraw hundreds and thousands of acres of land that are truly timberland, they have withdrawn and are holding within the withdrawal hundreds of thousands of acres which are just as tillable and as well fitted for cultivation and for the making of homes as those lands upon which fine homes to-day exist.

The result of it is that we have vast areas of agricultural land called timberland—land which would make good homes and provide means of livelihood for citizens—withdrawn and dedicated to eternal silence, upon which we can not lay taxes, and over which we can not cross without the consent of the Federal Government. The result is that it robs us of the means of building churches, of building schoolhouses, of building courthouses, and imposes upon the people an extraordinary burden by reason of the small portion of the land which is now under cultivation and subject to taxation.

If all this would result in the destruction of what is called monopoly with reference to natural resources, or if it would result in laying down these natural resources to the consumer at a lower rate and price than now enjoyed, there would be a strong argument, nevertheless, in its favor. You can not get a foot of timber of the Government of the United States a quarter of a cent cheaper than you can buy it from the most denounced timber monopolist in the West; so that the people get no benefit whatever from this system, and are to-day deprived of the advantage of settling up the lands without any compensation in return for that deprivation.

Some people seem to think this will benefit the Northwest in some way. I do not think so. If I thought it would open up Alaska, that would be some benefit. I do not believe it will. If I thought it would result in laying down the coal cheaper on the Pacific coast, that would be some benefit. I do not believe it will do so. But, Mr. President, like all other things, we can only learn in regard to it through experience, and I presume we have arrived at the point where we must have some experience in regard to the leasing system again in order to know whether or not it is a workable proposition. We have tried it some two or three times in this country, and each time it has been a failure; but human memory is short. We soon forget the experiences which we have had, and it is altogether probable that we have got to have some of those experiences again. That being true, Mr. President, while I have the greatest sympathy in the world for the people of Alaska, while I wish them well and hope that they will succeed, I would prefer to have this leasing system operate upon Alaska rather than in the United States. If it results in good, they need it more than anyone else. If it results in evil, we can get out of it there quicker than if it were fastened upon the States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was one of the conferees appointed on the part of the Senate to consider the differences between the House and the Senate upon this bill. I was in hopes that the agreements arrived at would be of such a nature that I could sign the report, but I felt that I could not sign the report as long as some of the provisions remained in the bill that are now found in the conference report.

I wish to refer particularly to section 9 of the conference report in which the maximum amount charged for royalty is eliminated. The Senate passed the bill and specified that the royalties to be charged by the Government should not be less than 2 cents per ton nor more than 5 cents. The conferees have stricken out the maximum price and left it so that the Government can charge any royalty they can get anyone to bid. I protest against the Government undertaking to secure the highest possible royalty, which will have to be paid by the consumer and collected with the avowed purpose of paying the United States back the $35,000,000 appropriated for building a railroad in Alaska. Mr. President, eight years ago nearly every person who was interested in the development of Alaska was told that there could be no coal mined in Alaska until Congress passed a coal-leasing bill, that no title should pass to an acre of coal land in that Territory, no matter whether the law had been complied with in every particular or not, until a leasing system was approved. The position then taken has proven true. When the first announcement of that policy was made and was to be hereafter followed by the Interior Department, I could hardly believe that it would be successful, but to-day Congress yields, and the first leasing law is to pass.

Four years ago I felt something must be done, and upon the pleading of the people of Alaska for some relief I myself introduced a leasing bill for Alaska. Senators and those who were the most pronounced conservationists, who said their only desire was to conserve the natural resources of the country, stated not only to the Committee on Public Lands but to the public generally that it was not their policy to create revenue for the Government out of the sale or leasing of the public lands of Alaska or the United States. They stated that all they wanted was to see that the natural resources were not wasted, that they were cared for, that the life of those who worked in the mines should be protected, and the Government should at least regulate questions of such vital importance.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], for instance, who, as everyone knows, believes in conservation and has preached it as long and as loud as any Senator, has always taken the position that the Government of the United States was not to speculate in coal lands, either in Alaska or in the United States. None of us will deny the fact that every dollar that is paid in royalties will have to be paid by the ultimate consumer.

It has been stated that the reason why the maximum is to be removed in this bill is to allow the collecting, through leasing coal lands in Alaska, every dollar possible in order to pay back to the Government of the United States the $35,000,000 appropriated for building a railroad in that Territory. It has been stated further that it was the opinion of some that they could get a dollar a ton royalty for coal mined in Alaska. If a dollar a ton is paid as a royalty for the coal in Alaska, it will have to be paid by the men who buy the coal and ultimately will fall upon the consumer.

Again, Mr. President, I am opposed to the leasing system in the United States. Whenever that policy shall be adopted by Congress and become a part of the laws of our land, the further development of the western part of this country will be retarded.

I do not want to go over the same ground this morning that has been gone over so well already by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and others. I want to say, Mr. President, that if this bill applied to the United States I would be one who would insist that every reason should be fully considered by Congress before any action could or should be taken upon it. I realize that we are in the closing days of this session. I hope that Congress can adjourn by Saturday of this week. If I were opposed to this measure in the same degree that I am opposed to leasing land in the United States, I would not undertake to filibuster against the passage of the bill and keep Congress in session. We have been in session now for about 18 months, and I know Senators and Representatives are weary and tired, and the strain they have been under during these long months of toil and labor is almost more than the physical strength of any man can stand.

But I want to say to the western Senators who are in favor of this bill that at the next session of Congress its passage will be pointed to as a precedent, and their attention will be called to the fact that we have already adopted a leasing system in the United States, and if they want to put a limit upon the royalties paid they will be forced to admit that they voted that there should be no limit on royalties from the coal mined in Alaska.

I believe that coal in Alaska should be produced at the very lowest possible price. I, as one of the conferees, insisted upon a maximum royalty. I said, "Let it be higher than any royalty paid in any part of the United States; strike out a 5-cent maximum and raise it to 15 or 20 cents." That was not agreeable to the balance of the conferees.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state, if the Senator will yield, that the maximum in the State of Colorado is 10 cents a ton.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish also to add, Mr. President, that the average of the whole United States is less than 10 cents a ton. There should be some maximum put upon the amount of royalty to be collected, and I was willing to make it twice the average amount charged in the United States. No; it was stated that some Members of the House thought that they could get a dollar a ton royalty out of the coal mined in Alaska.

Mr. President, I believe that whenever Congress passes a law it ought to be passed with the idea of meeting some situation of which the people of the country may take advantage. I do not believe there will be much mining of coal in Alaska under this bill; but I do hope that under the provisions of the bill citizens living within a stone's throw of millions of tons of coal can secure the right, at least, to obtain enough Alaskan coal to keep them warm through the winter.

We would not pass a coal-leasing bill for Alaska if it had not been that the coal lands of Alaska were withheld from development and people were compelled to send to West Virginia and Pennsylvania for their coal when they had millions of tons at their very doors. That was the sentiment back of this bill, and without it the bill could not pass this body. But it is going to pass; and I shall take no further time of the Senate to discuss the other provisions which seem very objectionable to me as contained in the conference report. However, I want it distinctly understood that, as far as I am personally concerned, the passage of this bill shall never be considered as a precedent for a leasing system in the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Referring to what the Senator has said upon the matter of placing a maximum limit upon the royalty which can be collected under this leasing system, let us assume, which is not an improbable case, that there was, in fact, a maximum limit of 10 cents per ton, and by reason of the peculiar conditions which might exist in a given locality some one would come along and bid 8 cents per ton, another 10 cents, another 25 cents per ton, does not the Senator feel that under those circumstances the Government ought to be in a position to accept the best bid?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not believe it. I believe Congress should provide that there shall be no royalty paid upon the coal land in Alaska above a certain limit, and then if there were one or two or a half dozen or more bidders upon the tracts of land that shall be surveyed under the bill, and if the royalty bid was exactly the same, the bill itself provides how a case like that shall be taken care of. The whole power is left in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. He has absolute authority to grant the lease to the person who, in his judgment, he considers would develop the mines for the best interest of the Government.

Mr. POMERENE. Assume, under the circumstances named, that one of the bidders offered 25 cents a ton; ought not the Secretary of the Interior to be in a position where he might accept that bid?

Mr. SMOOT. The bid he accepts, whatever amount it may be, will be passed on to the consumer, and the speculation in Government lands has not been the policy of the United States in disposing of its lands from the time that the leasing system proved such a failure years ago. The same theory might be advanced in relation to homesteads and public lands of all kinds.

Mr. POMERENE. There might be a situation where the operator could afford to pay a royalty of 25 cents per ton and yet be able to furnish that coal cheaper to the consumer than the man on another site could furnish it at 10 cents per ton.

Mr. SMOOT. That is absolutely true; but the same man could produce it still cheaper upon that same site at a royalty of 10 cents than he could at 25 cents.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the American people want to become tenants of the Government. I say, Mr. President, that the best citizen in the United States is he who owns his own home. He is at all times ready to defend his country. But it is different with a company. Foreigners may own a large part of the stock of it. I would like to see the time come——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator if there are many in his State who live on coal mines?

Mr. SMOOT. They live around coal mines, some of them above a coal mine.

Mr. WALSH. Do they acquire public lands there, or do they lease the ground?

Mr. SMOOT. Some of them, under the laws existing to-day, make homestead entries on lands that are classified as coal lands; they only secure the surface right, however.

Mr. WALSH. Unquestionably; but is not that quite apart from the question of ownership of coal lands?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly it is quite apart from the ownership of coal lands; but it is not apart from the question which the Senator asked.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, just a moment, if the Senator from Utah will permit me. The Senator spoke of cases of corporations where the list of stockholders showed that the majority of stock was held by foreigners.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I said a large part of the stock may be so held. I did not say a majority.

Mr. MYERS. I beg the Senator's pardon; I thought he said a majority. I merely want to say that of course this bill provides that a majority of the stock shall be held by citizens of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah was perfectly aware that that was carefully guarded, and did not make the statement that the majority of the stock could be held by foreigners.

Mr. MYERS. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what I am fearful of is that the adoption of this conference report will be only the forerunner of not only the leasing of our coal lands in this country, but of the leasing of our mineral lands and of our other public lands. I know the same power which is back of this bill—not perhaps in as great numbers—is also back of the propaganda that is going on in this country for the leasing of a great part of the remaining public domain. This legislation will merely be pointed to as a precedent. We shall be told that Congress has approved of the leasing system; that the American people want it, and if they want it it should be given to them. So much, Mr. President, for the question of leasing. I shall not say more at this time, nor do I even care whether or not we have a yea-and-nay vote on the adoption of the report.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I believe that the conferees have vastly improved the bill. While I voted for the bill as it passed the Senate, it contained some provisions which I believed were quite unwise. As I read the bill as now reported by the conferees, those provisions have practically all been eliminated. I was very much pleased to note that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who originally opposed the bill, and is entirely opposed to the plan contained therein, stated very frankly that, if we were to have a leasing system, he thought the bill reported by the conferees fully complied with that plan and gave us, on that theory, a No. 1 bill; that it contained the requisite qualifications and limitations which were necessary to safeguard that kind of a plan. So I believe the conferees are entitled to congratulations on having improved this measure and put it in such excellent shape.

Mr. President, there are three methods by which coal may be mined and coal lands may be operated. The first is for the Government to give patents under the law to those who desire to operate the mines or to own them, so that they are owned in fee simple; second, that the Government should retain the title and lease the lands for operation; and third, that the Government should not only retain the title, but that the Government should, as well, operate the mines and sell the coal upon the market.

Those who favor the ownership idea, as do the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and a great many other Senators, will vote against the adoption of the conference report, because they believe the bill goes too far; that we ought to have private ownership and not Government ownership. Some of those who believe in the other extreme, that the Government ought not only to own but ought to operate the mines, have voted against the bill because it does not go far enough. Among those are the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

A great many arguments can be adduced for each one of these particular systems. Personally I agree with the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Idaho. When the bill was before the Senate I voted for an amendment which provided definitely for the operation of the coal mines by the Government. I should like to see the Government undertake that. I believe it at least could do as well as we have seen the business managed under private ownership. It could not do much worse. So my sympathy is with the Senator from New Jersey, although I am going to vote for the conference report, because I think it is a great deal better than no system or than the other extreme.

The present situation has come about, Mr. President, because the people of the United States have become dissatisfied with the operation of the coal lands. Coal is one of the prime necessities of life, which has been given to us by an All-Wise Creator in abundance; and yet there are very many difficulties in getting it from the bosom of the earth to the fireside, where it is consumed. It is not that there is not coal enough, as the argument of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] would seem to sufficiently demonstrate; it is not that there is not enough coal to supply people for millions of years to come; but it is because by private ownership so often combinations have been formed; and the coal that ought to be furnished to all the people at as near cost as possible has been kept from them to enrich those who are already supplied with more than any one individual can possibly use in this life.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator from Nebraska realize that when the Geological Survey have reported that on the average coal is furnished at the mouth of the mine for $1.11 a ton there can not be any monopoly in its production, but that the monopoly arises from transportation?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and I also recognize that down in West Virginia, where the Senator from New Jersey has gathered a great deal of his information, where hundreds of people have been deprived of their liberty, and some of them have been deprived of their lives on account of existing conditions under the present law, coal mines are operated under private ownership.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Just a moment. I also recognize that in the Senator's own State the President has been compelled to send the soldiers of the United States Army in order to protect the lives of citizens.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The situation in respect to a strike may exist anywhere in the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. And does exist.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In West Virginia they have a private leasing system, and the same conditions have prevailed there.

Mr. NORRIS. They have no leasing system in West Virginia such as this bill provides for.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They have no governmental leasing system, but they have a private leasing system.

Mr. NORRIS. Under private ownership you will always have private leasing; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be, but these conditions do not arise by reason of leasing or the absence of leasing.

Mr. NORRIS. Difficulties have arisen under the present system, and they exist now. We have had trouble within the recollection of all of us in practically all of the coal mines of the United States. The system has been unsatisfactory. Perhaps we are about to enact legislation that will not help the situation, but I believe it will; I believe this bill provides for a system that will be an improvement at least over the present system, which certainly is unsatisfactory. There is much in the argument, and I agree with the Senator from New Jersey when he says that the coal, a necessity of life, placed in the bowels of the earth by the all-wise Creator, ought under proper law and regulations to be so managed that such conditions as we have had in the past and which exist now in some places may not again occur.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Colorado have said that they believed in a system of laws governing our public domain that would bring about the establishment of homes. So do I, for where the man residing on the land owns his home we have a better citizenship, we have a higher patriotism, and we have more happiness amongst the people; but, Mr. President, coal mines are not homes, and if you are going to establish and want to establish the kind of homes of which we have heard in the coal fields of West Virginia and Colorado, then the less of them the better.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must remember that I was not referring to this bill when I spoke of the question of homes. I referred to the fact that a measure which I expect before Congress at the next session will not only provide for the leasing of coal lands in the United States, but for the leasing of the public domain, and that, of course, will involve the question as to whether or not the people shall be able to make homes on this leased land.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington if the Senator from Utah is through.

Mr. SMOOT. I am through.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator from Utah inform us when and by whom that proposition is going to be presented?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it has already been presented many times in Congress.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This is the first time that I ever heard of it, and it is quite astonishing. Does the Senator mean to say that it is proposed to repeal or to substantially repeal the homestead laws of the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that the proposition is not to repeal the homestead laws of the United States, but it is to classify public lands and allow them to be leased, subject to homestead entries; but the Senator knows very well that after a piece of land is leased to a cattleman or a sheepman the man who would enter a homestead within that leased tract would stand no chance on earth of ever perfecting his entry and securing title to the piece of land.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The movement which the Senator from Utah and a number of other Senators have been criticizing has been the very opposite of the system to which the Senator now refers. The purpose of that movement is to give the benefit of the public lands to the individual citizen who wants to make a home on them. The object is to try to keep the public domain out of the hands of the big cattle and lumber companies.

Mr. SMOOT. That would not be the case if the cattle companies of this country do what they intend to do under the leasing system. There is not a cattle concern in the United States that is not in favor of the leasing proposition. They all want a leasing system for the public domain; and the Senator knows why, and so do I.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then I infer they, or those who represent them, are the ones who will present that proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not worried over what is going to happen because of some imaginary power that shall swoop down on us like a German Zeppelin, take all of our public domain away, and lease the homes of the people all through the West to some corporation or to some rich millionaire who wants to own the earth. I am in favor of homes. I do not believe there is any danger of Congress ever passing a law by which that part of the public domain which it can reasonably be expected will be occupied by actual settlers for the making of homes will ever be leased. Nobody has undertaken, so far as I know, to propose such a scheme. The leasing of lands not fit for homes for grazing purposes and the leasing of forest reserves not fit for homes is a different proposition. Those are questions upon which there may be a great deal of argument both pro and con; but there is always a question of fact involved as to whether the land in question is fit for homes or otherwise; but that has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LANE. I should like to suggest to the Senator, for his information, that there is a bill pending which proposes to lease for a term of 50 years water-power sites throughout the country, and which will control the water-power situation of this country, if it is entered into, as a general public plan of handling those properties.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LANE. Given possession, we will say, of a strategic point which controls the entire water power for an entire district, with that put into the hands of some corporation at a nominal figure—I think the price is very small for the rental of the land as provided in the bill to which I refer—it follows that that particular corporation will have entire control of the welfare of the entire community affected by its operations.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be.

Mr. LANE. That, I think, was perhaps what the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] referred to. There is such a bill being considered. I do not know whether it is out of the committee or whether it has even been recommended or what is its status, but it is being considered.

Mr. NORRIS. When that kind of a bill comes before us we will consider it. There may be some merit in it, but there will be a good deal of argument on each side. I wanted, however, to call attention to the fact that the question of homes can not be involved in a coal mine. The kind of ownership—by private parties—for which some Senators have been contending has not been a success, because we have had that system for, lo, these many years, and under it we have had strikes, we have had combinations, we have had monopolies, and we have had bloodshed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES. I just wanted to suggest, in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Oregon, that in the bill to which he refers there is a provision also for the regulation of the price at which the power shall be sold to the consumer.

Mr. LANE. I will ask the Senator to what extent that proviso goes?

Mr. JONES. The bill provides that no such lease shall be granted except in States where they have public-service commissions having power to regulate the price, and that if this power is distributed in an interstate way, then the Interstate Commerce Commission shall regulate the price. So I think that is just one important suggestion to go in the RECORD in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Oregon without argument.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not care to discuss the water-power question. It is of itself a great question; and as to what we shall do, what kind of a law we shall pass, it is very important. In my judgment it is more important than the Alaskan leasing bill or the bill for the leasing of coal lands in the United States. I consider it one of the most important questions that will ultimately have to be settled, because we will wake up some morning, in my judgment, not far in the future, and discover that during the preceding night some enterprising Yankee has invented a storage battery by which he can carry enough electrical power in his valise to run a railroad train across a State. When something of that kind is developed—and the battery is being improved every day—when a practical storage battery is developed, every little mountain stream that trickles down to the river and to the plain will be worth millions. We will come some day, perhaps within our lifetime, to the great electric age, when coal will be almost forgotten. I believe that even now, with the various utilities to which electric power has been applied, we ought to guard with jealous care the concentration of the water power of the country in the hands of any combination of men.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize the fact that nearly every State in the Rocky Mountain region has a public-utility commission with power to regulate the rates at which electric companies shall supply electricity to the people?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think that is true.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And that has also been true with respect to irrigation. The rates for water have been prescribed, under the statutes of Colorado, by the county commissioners, and they never have allowed an excessive rate. The theory that the Nation can do something better than a State, it seems to me, is all wrong.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe there will be a great deal of work on that line by the Nation. I believe it will be necessary.

I remember, just two or three years ago, going up the Columbia River, through the great State of Washington, and I came one evening to the place where I was to speak—a little town located at the head of a lake. In getting to the town, just about dusk, I drove over the outlet of that lake. It went out between walls of solid rock at a place narrower than the width of this Chamber, the water falling down over quite a precipice. The first thing that occurred to me was: "Why is not this wonderful power utilized?" I made inquiry of some of the citizens: "How large is this lake?" I do not remember the dimensions, but I think it was somewhere in the neighborhood of 70 miles in length, and not quite so wide; but it was a vast body of water, away up in the mountains, fed by springs, always maintained at about the same height, with a large volume of water continually going down over the rocks. I said: "Why, here you have power enough to do everything that anybody in this community can possibly need. Have you ever had it surveyed?" The man said to me: "It has been carefully surveyed, and between this outlet and the Columbia River"—which, I believe, was only 2½ miles away—"there is 750,000 horsepower now going to waste." They had electric lights in the little village, where I spoke that night, supplied by coal or some other power. They did not use the water power. I said: "Why do you not utilize it?" There was not a railroad within 50 miles. The reply was: "Why, Jim Hill owns all the water-power sites between here and the river. We do not have much to say about them." Yet there was not a Hill railroad, as I said, within 50 miles of the town.

Those things have been going on all over the United States. Wise and shrewd men, realizing that the water power of the country would some day, perhaps in the very near future, be the great means by which transportation would be had, by which even heat and all the other conveniences of life would be brought about, have acquired them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to observe that in the case to which the Senator refers it may have been that somebody had a monopoly of the site, but the Government of the United States has withdrawn from entry nearly all if not all of the water-power sites upon the public domain in the United States, and since that time there has been almost an absolute paralysis in the development of water power in the States. The State engineer of Colorado told me that up to the time of that withdrawal order there was plant after plant going up, and that since that time practically no filings for water-power lines have been made in the State engineer's office, but that if permitted there would be ample development made of the water power. We have only 4½ per cent of the water power of the State of Colorado developed now.

Mr. NORRIS. That only emphasizes what I was saying. It only emphasizes the necessity of placing the proper safeguards about the water-power proposition. The proper authorities must properly safeguard the development of water power in order to prevent it from getting in the control of monopoly, so that the people as a whole may get the benefit of the power that is given to them by God Almighty.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, Mr. President; but if you have a utility commission in your State that can control the prices of electrical power, why is it not the proper thing to make the development, and let the price be regulated by the commission?

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming that your commission is right, and that that is the right way to handle the question, that would be proper. I am not here defending every withdrawal that has been made. I believe they have been made in good faith. The Senator from Idaho told us of the vast withdrawals that were made in his State for timber purposes—another proposition that ought to be safeguarded. My own judgment is that there have been vast amounts withdrawn in the State of Colorado, and in all of the Western States, probably, that ought to be restored to the public domain. I think the Department of the Interior will, in due time, do so. Perhaps they will not do so as rapidly as the Senator would wish. He may get impatient, and his people may; but I think they are acting in good faith, and that they ought to and will restore those withdrawals where, upon fair and due investigation, it is disclosed that they ought not to have been made in the first place. But out of caution they would perhaps withdraw at the beginning—and it is perhaps natural that they should, guarding the public interests, as I believe they are trying to do—any region or any locality where there was any reasonable ground to believe that a withdrawal ought to be made.

But, Mr. President, that has not anything particularly to do with the question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that the waters of nonnavigable streams belong to the States, or to the people of the States?

Mr. NORRIS. I would not quarrel with the Senator about that. The legal question involved will be determined properly by the courts. I think there is a good deal in what the Senator says. I am not claiming that the Federal Government owns the water, but the Federal Government often owns land that controls the situation. If the Federal Government, by proper law and proper regulation, should impose upon the disposition of that land such conditions that the power could not gradually, or in any other way, be put in the hands of monopoly, and so that an unreasonable price for electric current could not be asked, it would be the proper thing for the Government to do it. I am not particular whether the Federal Government or the State government does it, just so it is done, but it must be done.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Everybody, of course, is opposed to monopoly and wants to regulate prices, and we believe that the States that have the control of the water should have the control of the price of the current that can be generated by these plants. It seems to me that when the Government, which simply owns a lot of rocks along which the pipe runs that produces the fall in water which produces afterwards the power that makes electric current, should not hold up and control the enterprise in a State. You might just as well say that a man who owns a piece of land that a railroad wants to go through has got to go and negotiate for part of the dividends of the road before it can be put through. It destroys the very power of eminent domain that is supposed to be the indicia of the sovereignty of the State.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; the Senator's illustration does not apply at all. There is a vast difference between giving to an individual the power to say absolutely that his land shall not be taken for railroad or for other public purposes and saying to the Government, "You shall do nothing with your land except to give it away."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; they can sell it, and should sell it; but they ought not to stand in the way of an enterprise looking to its development and use.

Mr. NORRIS. But suppose the Government does not sell it. I believe that the Government, in cases where it has the legal right to do so, ought to put conditions on any title that it parts with or any lease that it makes that controls a great water power so that it may be safeguarded against monopoly. If it is safeguarded, then it will inure to the benefit of the people just as well if it is safeguarded by the Federal Government as if it is safeguarded by the State government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Inasmuch as the right to the water belongs to the State, does not the Senator recognize that any attempt on the part of the National Government to get a royalty on water power is simply an indirect way of doing it by withholding the land?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and the Senator ought to recognize, too, that the rocks he speaks of that are by the side of the water the Federal Government owns.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No more than an individual would own them.

Mr. NORRIS. And the State owns the water no more than an individual. In fact, the State as such does not have title to the water. It is the people of the State that have it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But the water is the thing that makes the power, and when the Government of the United States recognizes that ownership in the State, or in the people of the State, it seems to me it is not fair for them indirectly to do that which they can not do directly, namely, charge a royalty on the water power.

Mr. NORRIS. And the rocks that the Senator speaks of by the side of the water being owned by the Federal Government, as I look at it, the Federal Government should have the same rights, if it desires to use them, to control the electric energy that is generated by the fall of the water, which, in fact, could not be generated if it were not for the use of those rocks on the side that the Government owns. It seems to me that the Senator is captious. He says, "I want to regulate this electric power; I want the people protected in its use, but I do not want the people to regulate it. I want the Government to give it away. I want the State to regulate it."

As far as I am concerned, I am willing that either the State or the Nation should regulate it; but as long as the Government has it, or has that which controls it, I am not in favor of giving that away, even to a State, except with proper safeguards that shall protect it against ownership by monopoly.

Now I am coming to the question before the Senate. I have been diverted by some of these interruptions, to which I do not object, because I think they are all conducive to bringing out information, although not especially on this particular bill.

I want to say to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] that this bill provides for the reservation in the Matanuska field of 7,680 acres of coal lands and in the Bering River field of 5,120 acres, and in all other fields it provides for a reservation of not to exceed one-half of the coal lands. Then the bill further provides, in another section, that the President of the United States shall have the right to operate these reserved coal lands. The Senator must remember, also, that in Alaska there are a great many coal lands outside of the Matanuska field and the Bering River field, so that there are still ample reservations made in the Government and authority given to the President to operate those mines.

When this law is passed the authority will be placed in the hands of the President of the United States to do that thing. If the Senator from New Jersey were President—and I wish he were—he would immediately exercise that right and operate these mines. I wish the President would do that; but I think the fact that he has the right to do it will be a great incentive to prevent any undue manipulation of those mines that are operated, even though the President does not exercise the right.

I understand that President Wilson is opposed to the Government operation of mines, although he is in favor of the leasing system as provided for in this bill; so I presume that unless some contingency should arise he would not himself operate the mines.

It is said by the Senator from Colorado, who had a good deal to say about reservations of other kinds of lands than coal lands, that these reservations in Alaska mean that Alaska will never have statehood; that so much of the land of Alaska will be reserved, and consequently not subject to taxation, that they will not have the means to support a State government.

Now, Mr. President, it looks to me as though this bill makes a very liberal provision to Alaska, as far as any revenue is concerned from these mines. In reality Alaska gets every cent there for the building of the railroad or for other purposes. It all goes into Alaska. I can see that, for instance, in some counties, I think, in Colorado and in some other States, where there have been such large withdrawals of land for various purposes that the municipal or county authorities are unable to operate their municipalities or counties properly on account of the fact that they have not enough property left to tax. I agree with the Senator from Colorado that that is a condition which ought to be avoided. I would not like to see that occur. I think every fair-minded man must agree that such a condition is to be abhorred. But, Mr. President, if the royalty obtained by these mines to Alaska does not amount to more than the taxation, or what ought to be considered reasonably fair taxes upon the property, when we come to admit Alaska as a State, if we do, it could easily be provided that these leased mines should pay in lieu of taxation a certain per cent on their output, or something of that kind. It could be easily provided for. There would be no difficulty in connection with it, in my judgment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator from Nebraska find any obstacle to prevent authorizing the State to impose a tonnage tax upon the coal?

Mr. NORRIS. None whatever.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator find any difficulty about authorizing the State to tax the lease?

Mr. NORRIS. The State would do that even without any provision here. There is not any question about that, in my judgment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment. In my judgment, if Alaska should be admitted as a State to-morrow she could tax the leases that exist, and probably would. Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] asked whether any objection the Senator could conceive of could be made to taxing the tonnage, the output, of the coal mines. Mr. President, that could not possibly be done unless an act of Congress authorized it. Wherever the Government has a system and something is to be done for its accomplishment, the instrumentality that is necessary to accomplish that purpose can not be the subject of taxation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment. If the Senator had any such coal mine up there, and he put an engine in it, or built a tramway, or built a lot of houses, washeries, and put in a whole lot of machinery, does the Senator contend that, if Alaska were a State, it could not tax that property?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, not in view of section 13. What does section 13 in the bill provide?—

SEC. 13. That the possession of any lessee of the land or coal deposits leased under this act for all purposes involving adverse claims to the leased property shall be deemed the possession of the United States, and for such purposes the lessee shall occupy the same relation to the property leased as if operated directly by the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. That is, as to the possession. That would not affect the taxation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It does, because you can recover possession by seizure for taxes. If the State could tax a piece of property, even then by the collection of taxes——

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose that were the case, the fact that a tax collector levied on an engine and sold it, that would not oust the man who had the mine leased from the Government or had possession of the mine.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But it would destroy the very lease of the United States, and unless it is expressly provided in the statute that the right of taxation does exist, it does not under the existing law.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator's theory is right, the star-route carrier or the rural-route carrier, who carries the Government mail, would not have to pay any tax on his horse or on his wagon, for if a tax were levied and the collector would sell it, he could immediately say, "This is a part of the machinery by which the United States mail is manipulated and carried, and therefore it is exempt."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to call the Senator's attention to a line of decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States where the question of the right of taxation upon the stock in a national bank is considered, and it is held that unless it is expressly provided in the act that it shall be the subject of taxation by the State it is exempt. If there is nothing said with relation to it, the power of the State does not exist, because it might be within the power of the State to destroy the national banks. So the power here to levy the tax upon the output of the mine would be, in effect, the power to destroy the very leasing system of the Federal Government, and for that reason the Government, as held by the Supreme Court of the United States, does not tolerate that line of taxation.

Mr. NORRIS. Every national bank in the United States is taxed by State authority and pays taxes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly; because there is in the law a provision that that can be done. In Seventh Wallace it is expressly stated that stock in a bank in the hands of a person can be taxed only because the United States Statutes authorize it.

Mr. NORRIS. Then in order to protect the rural-route carrier who carries the mail we ought to put in a provision allowing the State to tax his horses.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know about that; but anyway——

Mr. SMOOT. That is private property.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Anyway, as a matter of fact, that does not affect the matter, because that is a question of private property.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and the engine that the man uses, or the timber that he uses to build a ladder to go down into his mine, or the pick that he uses, the nails that he uses are private property, just as much as the horse is the private property of the rural carrier.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that, for instance, real estate——

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator say that you could not tax the shovels or the axes or the hammers or the tool boxes of the man who had leased a Government coal mine in Alaska?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It may be that there are some exceptions. I do not know that any of the courts have attempted to go to that extent.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. Every one of those is necessary in order to operate the mine.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The rule is that the instrumentalities that are needed by the Government for the purpose of the accomplishment of their system are not the subject of taxation unless it is expressly provided in the act giving the right of taxation.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska and others to the fact that section 13 says:

That the possession of any lessee of the land or coal deposits leased under this act for all purposes involving adverse claims to the leased property—

That is all. It is for purposes involving adverse claims.

Mr. NORRIS. As I called to the attention of the Senator from Colorado, it refers only to the question of the possession of the mine. It is put in there to protect the miner against some third person who might want to dispossess him.

Now, Mr. President, I want to take up another proposition, and then I will be through. A great deal has been said by those who have debated this question about the conference report taking out of the bill the maximum royalty. As the bill passed the Senate it provided that the royalty should not be less than 2 cents a ton and no more than 5 cents a ton. As it passed the House it had no maximum. The Senate conferees have receded, and in the bill we have before us now, as reported by the conferees, the maximum is removed and it provides only that there shall be 2 cents or more exacted on each ton as royalty.

I wish to say that I would not for a moment desire to put a royalty on the mining of the coal if it would increase the cost of the coal to the consumer; and, as a general proposition, I want to admit that the consumer of the coal pays the royalty. But let us consider now what I think was in the mind of some of those who took part in the debate in the House and those who were on the conference committee—the conditions existing in regard to the Cunningham claims, about which we heard so much a few years ago, and which were the subject of an agreement by which they should be operated by the Guggenheim interest. It was an agreement by which they were to be operated and released to this combination, providing that they should pay a royalty of 50 cents a ton, as I remember. If I am wrong, I would be glad to be corrected. As I remember hearing the evidence in the Pinchot-Ballinger investigation, that agreement provided that they should pay 50 cents a ton.

Now, let us assume a condition, and the figures I am giving now I give only for illustration. I know nothing about the price of coal on the Pacific coast, but let us assume now that such coal as is mined in Alaska is selling in Seattle at $5 a ton. Let us further assume that the lessee of one of these mines in Alaska can get that coal down to Seattle and sell it at a reasonable profit at $4 per ton, and that his competitor there can not sell for less than $5. What would happen? He would put the coal to about $4.95 a ton. He could properly do so; I am not criticizing him for it. Anyone who was in the business would do it if he could. He would sell it for just as much as he could get. He could beat out his competitor if he sold it at $4.95.

Now, if he got it down there for $4 a ton he would have a profit of 95 cents a ton. Suppose he had to pay a royalty to the Government of 50 cents a ton. Would it make any difference in the price at which he would sell it down there? He would sell it, perhaps, at the same price, if there were conditions where he would come in competition with other men dealing in the same kind of coal. He would put the price as high as he could put it and still be able to sell the coal. If the Government charged no royalty it would simply add to his profit in that case. If the Government charged a royalty, the price to the consumer would be absolutely the same, and the Government would get some of the profit; or, in other words, Alaska would get it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator take into consideration that there are a great many leases there and competition will enter in if leases are to be made as we anticipate? If they are not to be made, then, of course, nothing would come from it.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course that is a disputed question. I am in hopes there will be leases made, and I believe there will be. It is my own idea that, with a properly guarded lease, such as the department can enter into under this law, a very high royalty would not be charged.

Mr. SMOOT. They would have to charge what is bid.

Mr. NORRIS. They will not need to lease it in that way.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the bill provides for competitive bidding.

Mr. NORRIS. It can be competitive bidding, but it does not necessarily have to be a bid on the royalty to be paid. The lease can very easily provide under the bill regulations by which the royalty would be lowered or raised under conditions that might arise. I do not anticipate that there will be a high royalty. If the Senator's theory is right, that the Secretary of the Interior should only advertise for bids on a royalty basis—that is, that he should give it to any man who would bid the highest royalty—the very fact that they were bidding a high, unreasonable price might, if they were bidding in that way, result in an increase to the consumer, which, of course, should be avoided.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator the bill requires that the Secretary must advertise these different tracts after they are surveyed as being open for bids.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but it does not say that he is to lease it to the various men in accordance with the royalty that they will agree to pay in their bid. There are a great many conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that if one man bids 10 cents and another man bids 15 cents and another man 20 cents, the man who bid 20 cents would get the lease.

Mr. NORRIS. Everything else being equal, he would, I suppose. Now, let me put this to the Senator: Suppose we had the Senate provision, which provided that the royalty should not be less than 2 cents nor more than 5 cents, and then the Secretary should advertise for bids, how would they bid? They would all bid 5 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. If they did, the Secretary of the Interior would have the power under the bill to enter into a lease with the party who, in his opinion, would mine the coal the best or give the best public service, or whatever his judgment might influence him to do for the public good.

Mr. NORRIS. But that is the power which has been criticized all through this debate. The critics say it has been criticized too much. I have not said so.

Mr. SMOOT. He has that power.

Mr. NORRIS. He has a good deal of power, and of course he must have it in order to carry out the provision of the bill and get good results.

But, Mr. President, when the Secretary accepts bids there will be different kinds of coal in different localities. It is fair to say that the bids will correspond somewhat with the quality of the coal. He can put conditions in the offer for bids in regard to the price at which it shall be sold or the method in which it shall be mined or handled, and have competition on that. There are various ways in which there might be competition. I do not anticipate that there is going to be anything like a royalty of a dollar a ton paid for this coal. My own judgment is that it would be bad if that should occur, because I am satisfied that if it went up as high as that it would be beyond the limit of competition in the localities where the coal would be sold, and the effect would be injurious.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a moment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

DRESS AND WAIST INDUSTRY.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that "Wages, regularity of employment, and standardization of piece rates in the dress and waist industry of New York City," by N. I. Stone, chief statistician of the wage-scale board of the dress and waist industry, be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. POINDEXTER. What is the report?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a report made by Mr. N. I. Stone, chief statistician of the wage-scale board of the dress and waist industry of New York City. I will say to the Senator, it is a rather remarkable report. For years there has been a dispute between the wage earners and the employers of labor in the dress and waist industry of New York. I have no doubt the Senator will remember the trouble that has existed in the State of New York and, in fact, other States in this industry. This board was appointed by the State for the purpose of seeing if there could not be some plan evolved whereby the regulation of the wages of employees could be arrived at on a scale basis. That has been arrived at, and I think it is the first time in the history of the industry where employer and employee have arrived at a plan that was satisfactory to all concerned, and this was the result.

Mr. CHILTON. What will be the cost?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is that a Government board, a State board, or a board appointed by the employers and employees?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a State board. I want to say to the Senator that it is perfectly satisfactory to all concerned, and the labor people here desire that this report be printed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It would be very expensive, would it not?

Mr. SMOOT. It would not be very expensive.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Has the Senator estimated what the cost will be?

Mr. SMOOT. It is not printed matter, and there are a number of tables in it; but my opinion offhand would be that it would cost to print the usual or up number of copies, about 1,672 copies, something between two hundred and three hundred dollars—not to exceed that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course that is rather indefinite.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator objects, I certainly shall not make the request. I simply want to say that it is a remarkable report, and the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Labor is greatly interested in it, and asks that it be printed. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator objects, to withdraw my request; but the laboring people of the State of New York have requested it. Not only that, but the employers of the men and women in the dress and waist industry have asked it; and I think, after examining it, that it is a very remarkable piece of work.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

THE COTTON SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to send to the desk an amendment intended to be proposed to the tax bill, which is the unfinished business. I do so because I desire the amendment to be printed in the RECORD and also to be printed for the use of the Senate.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SMITH of Georgia to the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, viz: Insert the following:

"SEC. 26. That during the year of 1915 a special excise tax is hereby levied, and shall be paid and collected not later than December of said year, upon every person, firm, or corporation engaging in the business of planting, growing, or producing cotton, said tax to be measured as follows:

"Every such person, firm, or corporation shall pay a tax of 2 cents a pound upon all lint cotton produced or grown by such person, firm, or corporation in excess of 50 per cent of the total amount of lint cotton produced by such person, firm, or corporation in the year 1914: Provided, That where any such person, firm, or corporation was not engaged in the business of planting, growing, or producing cotton in the year 1914, such person, firm, or corporation shall pay a tax of 2 cents a pound on all lint cotton produced by such person, firm, or corporation in excess of 50 per cent of the total amount of lint cotton produced in the year 1914 on the farm or plantation operated by such person, firm, or corporation in the year 1915.

"The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations for the collection of the tax herein provided for.

"SEC. 27. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have immediately prepared bonds of the United States to the amount in face value of $250,000,000. The said bonds shall be in denominations ranging from $10 to $500, and shall be made due on or before three years from date, and bear interest at 4 per cent per annum, and shall be payable in gold.

"SEC. 28. That the said bonds shall be used at their face value for the purchase of 5,000,000 bales of lint cotton, payments to be made in said bonds to the sellers of such cotton, and the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Agriculture are hereby constituted a board with authority to conduct such purchases and to carry out the provisions of this act in connection with the purchase, handling, and sale of said cotton.

"The said purchases shall be made exclusively from the producers of such cotton.

"Said purchases shall be made at the price of 10 cents per pound for middling lint cotton. Other grades of cotton may be bought at prices higher or lower than 10 cents, based on the difference of their values, as the same are more or less valuable than middling cotton. The purchases shall be made in the States where the cotton is grown, and shall be prorated between the States, as far as practicable, according to the quantity of cotton grown in each State. The cotton so purchased shall be handled under the direction of the board hereinbefore provided for, and none of the same shall be disposed of earlier than January 1, 1916, unless, in the opinion of the said board, parts of said cotton are required to furnish cotton for manufacture, in which event parts of said cotton may be sold at a price of 11 cents a pound or more. During the year beginning January 1, 1916, said cotton may be sold in blocks of 100 bales or more at the market price, but not for less than the amount that it has cost, including interest on the bonds, storage, etc. On and after January 1, 1917, so much of said cotton as has not already been disposed of shall, within six months thereafter, be sold by said board. The money received from the sale of said cotton shall be kept separately in the Treasury and shall be used to pay off the bonds provided for in section 27 of this act, and whenever $5,000,000 has been accumulated from the sale of said cotton, blocks of said issue of bonds shall be called in and redeemed, and said board is given full power and authority to make such rules and regulations as are necessary for the purpose of executing the provisions of this and the preceding sections.

"SEC. 29. That for the year 1916 a special tax is hereby levied, and shall be paid and collected during the months of August, September, October, November, and December, upon every person, firm, or corporation engaging in the business of planting, growing, or producing cotton, said tax to be measured as follows:

"Every such person, firm, or corporation shall pay on all lint cotton produced or grown by such person, firm, or corporation during said year an amount equal to one-half cent per pound on such cotton, and the same shall be payable before said cotton leaves the gin house.

"The taxes provided for in this section and in section 26 of this act shall be kept as a separate fund in the Treasury, and shall be used for the purpose of paying the interest on said bonds provided for in section 27 of this act and the expenses of handling said cotton provided for in section 28 of this act, and any surplus shall be used for the purpose of paying off the principal of said bonds.

"SEC. 30. That after the cotton, the purchase and sale of which is provided for in sections 27 and 28 of this act, has been disposed of, it shall be the duty of the said board to prepare a statement covering the entire expenditure by the Government in connection with said transactions, including the redemption of said bonds, and if any part of said expenses has not been met under the provisions of sections 28 and 29 it shall be the duty of said board to officially report the amount remaining unpaid, and said report shall be filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. For the year 1917, and annually thereafter, a special tax is hereby levied and shall be paid and collected during the months of August, September, October, November, and December upon every person, firm, or corporation engaging in the business of planting, growing, or producing cotton, said tax to be measured as follows:

"Every such person, firm, or corporation shall pay on all cotton produced or grown by such person, firm, or corporation during each of said years an amount equal to 1 cent per pound on such cotton, and the same shall be payable before said cotton leaves the gin house: Provided, however, That if the report of said board, filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shows that no amount remains unpaid, the excise tax provided for in this section shall not be collected: And provided further, That no tax shall be collected under this section except for the balance of the amount remaining unpaid as provided for in this section.

"SEC. 31. That the sum of $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated and made immediately available under the direction of the said board, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of sections 27 and 28 of this act."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that to-morrow morning I will address the Senate upon the subject embraced in the amendment. I desire to call attention to the fact that while this amendment provides for the issuance of $250,000,000 of short-time low-rate bonds for the purpose of exchange for cotton, with the view of absorbing 5,000,000 bales of cotton, it also provides that that cotton shall be sold in 1916 and 1917; and it levies a tax on the cotton produced in 1917 for any amount that the sale of the cotton does not reimburse the Government, if it fails in any way to reimburse the Government.

In this connection I also wish at this time to call attention to these facts: That the Government has loaned its credit to build railroads in the West to the amount of $120,000,000. That it has furnished money for the reclamation of lands in large quantity in the West. That at this session we voted $35,000,000 to build railroads in Alaska. That the Government has used its resources to ward off disaster by the deposit of hundreds of millions of dollars at one time in the banks. That we have furnished money and loaned the credit of the Government to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars to advance the citizens of the Philippine Islands toward civilization, with the avowed purpose of doing it simply as a philanthropy, and of giving up the islands as soon as the philanthropy shall have been completed. To-morrow I hope to have an opportunity to discuss this subject and to present my views upon it.

I desire the RECORD to show, in this connection, that the amendment which I have presented is presented not simply for myself, but for quite a number of Senators who took part in its preparation.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 5614. It is really an emergency measure. It provides for a change regarding the appointment of United States consuls and secretaries to embassies. It has the unanimous approval of the Foreign Relations Committee. When I asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill a day or two ago the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] objected, but he now understands the bill and withdraws his opposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would inquire of the Senator from Montana if he is ready to have the conference report laid aside?

Mr. MYERS. Is the Senator from New York aware that the conference report of the Alaska coal-leasing bill has not yet been disposed of?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I realize that I must have the Senator's consent before I can proceed with the bill which I desire to have passed upon.

Mr. MYERS. How long will it take?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do not think there will be any discussion on the bill.

Mr. MYERS. Will there be no remarks for or against it?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I understand not. The department is desirous of having it acted upon. The only change it makes in existing law is that at present when a secretary to an embassy is appointed he is appointed to a specific embassy, and he can not be transferred by the State Department from that embassy to another except by the consent of the Senate. So when a consul is appointed he is appointed to a particular post and can not be transferred by the department to another post of the same grade without the consent of the Senate. This bill is designed to permit the State Department to make such transfers according to the exigencies of the service.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Regular order, Mr. President.

ALASKA COAL LANDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to congratulate the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] on bringing in this report and on accomplishing what he was really afraid the other day he would not be able to accomplish. I am satisfied that the bill which he has reported is a better bill than the one presented by the conference report a few days ago. I voted for that conference report because of my desire to see something done for Alaska, and I will vote for this conference report with much more pleasure than I did for that one.

Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has depicted the conditions in Alaska very vividly and very correctly, and the conditions which he has mentioned constitute really the reasons that I have for supporting this legislation. I am going to vote for this conference report and, as has already been stated by others, I shall not consider it a precedent when the general leasing legislation comes up for consideration. I may be in favor of those bills, and I may not be; but I consider that they should be determined on the merits of the respective propositions.

As stated by the Senator from Colorado, lands are absolutely tied up in Alaska; nothing can be done there; nothing has been done for several years; and there is no prospect of anything being done. I think I can recognize a stone wall when I see it; and, to my mind, there is absolutely no hope for any Executive ever releasing those lands from the condition they are in now. I know that the Executive can do so; he can do so tomorrow; but, in the face of the public sentiment that exists in the country, no Executive would do so; and I should blame no Executive for not doing so. The only hope is in some legislation by Congress to get these lands opened up; and this is absolutely the only legislation that Congress can pass; you can not bring anything else up even for consideration; and this is in response to the public sentiment that prevails in the country.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as I understand the attitude of the Senator, he advocates this bill as a choice of evils?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator thinks it is a lesser evil than to submit to longer delay in opening up the coal lands of Alaska?

Mr. JONES. Yes; under the conditions which now prevail. I shall vote for this bill in the hope that it will better conditions in Alaska; I shall vote for it in the hope that it will result in the opening up and in developing the coal industry in that country.

Mr. President, there is one provision in the bill, if it did nothing else, which I think would decide me to vote for it, and that provision improves existing conditions. I think that was referred to by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. The provision I have in mind is the one which will make it possible for the individual in that country to get coal, at least for domestic purposes, where the individual is at all near the coal fields and coal lands. In other words, there is a provision under which a man can get a 10-acre tract without going into competition, without making competitive bids, and having complicated leases and operations of that sort, but not for the purpose of supplying the home or domestic market. That is a great benefit in itself, if nothing else comes from this legislation.

As I stated the other day, I doubt if very much will be done under this legislation. I join with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], however, in believing that if we are to have a leasing system, if we must have it—and that seems to be the only thing to relieve the conditions in Alaska—the system provided for in this bill is just about as good a one as could be provided. I do not know of any improvements that I would really suggest in the matter.

I agree with the Senator from Nebraska with reference to the royalty feature of the conference report as now presented. As I said the other day, I think that the price at which the coal will be sold will be determined not by the royalty that is imposed, but by what can be gotten in the market. If there is no competition in Alaska, then the man who has the coal to sell will get everything that he can out of it, royalty or no royalty; and if there is no royalty, of course there will be more to go into his pocket than if the royalty is imposed.

I can see where advantage might come to the large interests by competitive bidding with this unlimited royalty, and that is that the strong interests that desire to get control of some particular locality or some particular coal tract will, of course, bid high and finally get it; but I think that probable situation is overbalanced by the other interest.

This is the situation there: The coal is all tied up; there is no hope of getting it released; nobody can get even a bucketful of coal for his own use. That is an intolerable condition; it is an intolerable situation. This is the only way to open up those lands; it is the only way to relieve the situation; and I am glad to see that we are doing something, that we are adopting some system under which a change will possibly come about. If it does not come about under this act, we can change it. It is not an unchangeable act on our part; it is not like a constitution, which it is difficult to change by a constitutional amendment; but if it does not work well, if it does not accomplish what we hope to accomplish by it, we can change it or repeal it and adopt some other system, and that is what we will do.

I am not very fearful about its even being cited with any great force as a precedent for a general leasing system in this country, because the conditions in Alaska are exceptional; they can not be duplicated anywhere in the United States; and a system that would be applicable there or that might work out there would be wholly inapplicable in this country. So that I am very glad, indeed, that the conferees have brought in this report, and I hope it will be adopted.

The provision with reference to the claimants up there I shall say nothing about. I had indulged the hope that the conferees, in considering the matter further, would be able to comply more nearly with the provisions of the bill as it passed the Senate; but I know the difficulties under which they labored, and I know they have done the very best they could. I think they have improved the situation in that respect also. So I shall cheerfully vote for the conference report.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the vote is taken—and I trust it will be taken speedily—I desire to take the time of the Senate to make a brief statement.

In the course of some remarks made upon this bill when it was first before the Senate for consideration I made the statement that the Rocky Mountain Fuel Co. is owned and controlled by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and has the same board of directors. An error occurred in that statement. I should have said that the Rocky Mountain Coal & Iron Co. was controlled by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, just an observation. I will detain the Senate but a moment or two. Practically all the objections that have come to this report have come from those who opposed the bill itself. I regard it as res adjudicata that the Senate wants this bill; it has said so, and decided that question. The only objection that has been made to the report is that the maximum royalty has been abolished; and, in a few words, I want to read to the Senate what the Secretary of the Interior said about that, because it states the reasons very concisely. I quote from a letter of the Secretary of the Interior:

> Another objection to the measure as reported by the Senate committee and passed by the Senate is the fact that it fixes the minimum royalty which may be collected under a coal-land lease in Alaska at 2 cents and the maximum royalty at 5 cents per ton. The bill as passed by the House fixes the minimum at 2 cents per ton, but fixes no maximum. In my judgment it is unwise to fix a maximum royalty which may be exacted, and especially so to fix it at 5 cents per ton. The minimum was purposely fixed low, because of the existence of many fields of lignite or other low-grade coals in Alaska, but if report and expectation be realized there will be found in the Bering River and Matanuska fields and perhaps elsewhere in Alaska high-grade anthracite, semianthracite, and coking coals, easily mined, accessible to water transportation, and for which a maximum royalty of 5 cents per ton would be ridiculously inadequate. Every lessee will know in advance of the taking of a lease the maximum royalty which he will be required to pay, and it is clearly unwise to hamper and restrict the United States in leasing its Alaskan coal deposits by imposing a limitation on the maximum royalty. High-grade coals under lease in the United States proper produce much higher royalties than 5 cents per ton, and no good reason occurs to me why the operators in Alaska, who are fortunate enough to secure leases upon high-grade coal deposits in that Territory, should be especially favored in obtaining the benefits of 5-cent royalties for choice coal.
> I earnestly hope that Congress may decide to eliminate the maximum royalty provision and content itself with fixing a minimum royalty of 2 cents, leaving the maximum to be determined by the circumstances and conditions, character and location of the coal to be leased, and the willingness of the would-be lessee to pay what he regards as a reasonable royalty for the coal leased.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, October 14, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Hasten the day, O God, our heavenly Father, when Thy children shall live together in peace and harmony. In the world's broad fields of endeavor there is room enough and plenty for all, but for the selfishness, greed, ambitions, and unholy desires of men. Quicken the good that is in us, that as individuals and as a nation we may live what we profess to believe, practice what we preach, doing unto others as we would have them do unto us, that we may be an example to all the world in righteousness and in good government. That Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done, in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Journal be approved.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I wish to ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech made by Representative MORRISON, of Indiana, before the convention that nominated him for Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by his colleague [Mr. MORRISON] to the convention which nominated him. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on yesterday evening the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks by incorporating a speech delivered by Representative WINSLOW, and, also, Representative PLATT, of New York, asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the subject of the Grand Army, to which objection was made. If these two requests be coupled with the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss], I will have no objection to it.

Mr. MANN. Do not couple them together.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume there will not be any objection to their requests.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a speech delivered by Representative WINSLOW at the Republican State convention in Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a speech made by his colleague [Mr. WINSLOW] at the Republican State convention in Massachusetts. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Representative PLATT, I ask unanimous consent that he be given the privilege of printing his remarks in the RECORD on the subject indicated last night, namely, the Grand Army.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of pensions. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wyoming rise?

Mr. MONDELL. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on sundry political subjects.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on sundry political subjects. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, does not the gentleman think two to one is sufficient for one day?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yesterday it was three to one—three on that side and two on this.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But not political speeches.

Mr. STAFFORD. They were political speeches, too.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD extracts from a speech made by Mr. Roosevelt at the great Progressive convention at Bay City, Mich., recently.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by Col. Roosevelt at Bay City, Mich. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER. Under the special rule the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18459, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18459, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

With the pending amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that there is a little error here that I think the chairman of the committee will agree to correct, and I move to strike out the last word in order to make the suggestion. On page 22, lines 21 and 22, it is provided:

That no franchise or right shall be granted to any corporation except under the conditions that it shall be subject to amendment—

And so forth. Now, I propose to strike out those words, "to any corporation," or else add "to any person or corporation." Any franchise granted to John Jones or Bill Smith would not, if he assigned it to a corporation, come under this provision. It says that any franchise granted to any corporation shall be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal.

Mr. JONES. What line?

Mr. BRYAN. Line 22, page 22, "No franchise or right shall be granted to any corporation except under the conditions," and so forth. Now, I suggest that we strike out those words "to any corporation" and make the provision apply to any franchise that is granted. It amounts to a "joker" as it is—unintentional, of course—but it is a "joker" whose bones ought to be cracked.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I suggest that the language usually used, and that which would probably be necessary, would probably be "individual, firm, or corporation."

Mr. BRYAN. That would be all right. But the word "person" would, I understand, cover corporations under our statute, but "corporation" is restrictive. If you strike out the words "to any corporation," there will be no question left, and I suggest that the chairman either revise the language that I have suggested or else strike out those words.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, of course we can only return to this section by unanimous consent. I think it might be well enough to make this change, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to return to this section, so that I may offer to amend, in line 22, after the word "any," by adding the words "individual, firm, or."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Virginia the number of the section.

Mr. JONES. Section 26.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] asks unanimous consent to return to section 26 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 22, line 22, after the word "any," by inserting the words "individual, firm, or."

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the word "person."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman what is a right granted to a person where you reserve the right also to take away the lands or use and occupation of the lands? Is it designed not to permit the Philippine Legislature, under a general or special law, to grant any rights to persons over lands in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. JONES. I believe, Mr. Chairman, the words "franchises and rights" are somewhat synonymous as here used. They are the words employed in the organic law. I think the word "right" is simply used to broaden the meaning and purpose of this provision.

Mr. MANN. Of course, if it has been settled by any construction that the word "right" really means "franchise," very well. I understood, when we passed the original legislation, that it was designed to curb the authority of the Philippine Commission to grant land to corporations, but it was not designed to prevent them from granting the right of land to individuals. Now, if you insert in every patent of land that is granted a provision that land may be taken away from the individual, it looks to me as though you were destroying the value of the grant.

Mr. JONES. I think the gentleman is confusing this section, which applies entirely to franchises, with those sections which relate to the disposition of land. As has been suggested to me by a gentleman sitting near me, Mr. GARRETT, the word "right" might be used in connection with the exercise of the right of eminent domain, whereas the word "franchise" would not be applicable in that connection. This language has been in the present law for 12 years. I do not know how often it has been construed, but I do know it has been the law for 12 years, and the committee thought, inasmuch as there has been no complaint in respect to it, that it would be best to reenact it in its present form.

Mr. MANN. This proposition is to change it from its present form. It now restricts the right to make a grant to a corporation, and then it goes on and says "rights of use and occupation of lands thus granted shall revert to the governments by which they were respectively granted," and so forth. It plainly covers, or plainly could be held to cover, the granting of lands for other purposes. If, however, the gentleman is satisfied with it, I shall not object.

Mr. JONES. There has never been any criticism of this section, so far as I know, and we were content to keep the language of the present law. I ask for a vote on the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I think when we rose last evening there was an amendment pending which I had offered to section 27. I had moved to strike out the figures "$18,000," in line 20, and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$25,000." I was assured that that would be opposed, but that the chairman of the committee was willing to accept an amendment to this effect: "not less than $18,000, the amount to be fixed by the Philippine Legislature." I am perfectly willing to accept that.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman says is true, but since I indicated that I would not object to his amendment I have conferred with other members of the committee, and we think that no minimum should be fixed unless there is also a maximum limit. If the gentleman cares to offer an amendment substituting $20,000 for $18,000, I shall not oppose its adoption.

Mr. MILLER. Is it not the disposition of the committee to accede to the wishes of the Filipinos, expressed as they have been many times, especially through their Resident Commissioner and the speaker of their assembly?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I think that the sentiment which was voiced by Commissioner QUEZON is due to the fact of Gov. Gen. Harrison's exceptional popularity. The Filipinos would like, I am aware, to increase his salary. But I do not think that that fact, however, ought to be taken into consideration in fixing the salary for this position. I really think that in view of the impoverished condition of the islands and the fact that the government is retrenching expenses in every direction, we ought not to increase the salary above what it originally was.

Mr. MILLER. I believe it was $20,500.

Mr. JONES. It was $20,500. I suggest that the gentleman modify his amendment by making it "$20,000," and there will not be any objection on this side.

Mr. MILLER. I readily appreciate the fact that the force of numbers is on that side, and they can vote it down. But I would like to have a vote to decide the question whether or not the committee is willing to accede to the wishes of the Filipinos, expressed as clearly as they can be expressed. I do not concede the position that the gentleman takes now, that the only reason why the Filipinos have ever suggested an increase in the salary of the Governor General is that they like Gov. Gen. Harrison. If that is the situation, they are the most shortsighted and the most nearsighted people imaginable, possessing not at all the qualifications for self-government claimed time out of mind for them by the gentleman from Virginia. Surely they see farther than the noses on their faces. Surely when they speak of the salary of the Governor General it means the salary of all Governors General, and not merely this one.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Since when have you become so deferential to the wishes of the people over there?

Mr. MILLER. I have always been.

Mr. GORDON. Then, why do you not vote for their independence?

Mr. MILLER. Will you vote for their independence now?

Mr. GORDON. I will, and you will vote against it.

Mr. MILLER. This bill is as far from giving independence to the Philippine people as the gentleman is far from knowing what the wishes of the people are.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I hope we will not take up any more of the time of the committee in the discussion of questions that have already been thrashed over. I do not understand that the Philippine people have expressed a desire to have this proposed increase of salary. The representative from the Philippine Islands did say that he believed his people would like to see it increased, but I know of no action that has been taken by the people in the Philippine Islands relating to the subject.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from the Philippine Islands, as I recall, interrupted me for the purpose of explicitly stating that it was the desire of the Filipino people that the Governor General should receive a salary of $25,000. He substantiated that and emphasized it by stating that he had received a letter or a cablegram from Señor Osména, speaker of the Philippine Assembly, in which he said that the salary of the Governor General should be $25,000. I will say, in addition, that men I have talked with on the subject of salaries in the islands, no matter how they may have differed in other matters, all agreed that the salary of the Governor General should be $25,000.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman knows that the assembly over which Señor Osména presides voted last winter to reduce this salary.

Mr. MILLER. I understand full well that they did that at the personal request of Gov. Gen. Harrison, and he is not to be blamed for the attitude he then took. They desired to reduce many salaries in the islands, some which I think should properly have been reduced, and he saw at once that it would not be consistent for him to urge or recommend the reduction of other salaries unless his own were cut. So he voluntarily requested that his own salary be cut nearly $3,000, and the gentleman knows that the salary does not cut much figure with a man like Gov. Gen. Harrison.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman can offer his amendment for $25,000, but I hope he will modify it so as to make it $20,000. I will not object to making the amount $20,000.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the figures "$18,000," in line 20, page 24, and after the word "General" insert the following: "not less than $18,000, the amount to be fixed by the Philippine Legislature."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. My amendment pending which was to be taken up to-day as a new section comes in before section 27. Will the consideration of this amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota interfere with the new section 26a?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that following this section the amendment referred to by the gentleman from Washington will be taken up.

Mr. BRYAN. But the gentleman from Minnesota is offering an amendment to section 27, and my new section is 26a.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word about the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MOORE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. Did I understand the Chair to say that we would go back to some other section of the bill after the consideration of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We so agreed yesterday afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that was agreed to before the adjournment last night.

Mr. MOORE. That does not cut off offering further amendments to section 27.

The CHAIRMAN. We are considering section 27 now, which the Chair understands is subject to amendment.

Mr. MOORE. I desire to say that I have some amendments to section 27.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will glance at the RECORD of yesterday afternoon, he will see that the agreement was that we should pass over the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington and read section 27, and after the completion of that we should return to the consideration of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MOORE. That agreement was not made to the exclusion of other amendments to section 27.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly not.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word about the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]. His amendment provides that there shall be a minimum amount fixed in this statute for the salary to be appropriated for the Governor General by the Philippine Legislature. Now, the only reason, as I understand, that we throw any restrictions about the Philippine Legislature is that the restrictions may operate in favor of the Filipino people. If we make any restriction as to the amount of the salary, it ought to be a maximum amount above which they could not take from the treasury to pay an American sent over there to act as Governor General. If we fix a minimum amount, that leaves it open for them to give $100 000 a year. There ought to be a maximum with it, of course. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, that after the words "Governor General," line 20, page 24, insert the words "not more than $15,000, the amount to be fixed by the Philippine Legislature."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I find that on yesterday afternoon I offered an amendment to increase the salary from $18.000 to $25,000, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment he speaks of. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota by substituting $15,000 for $18,000.

Mr. BORLAND. No; change the wording. The amendment is to insert $15.000 and change the wording, the amount to be fixed by the Philippine Legislature.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting "not more than $15,000, the amount to be fixed by the Philippine Legislature."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is unquestionably right. If there is any utility in fixing the salary in the organic law, it is to fix a maximum above which the legislative body or those having control of the treasury can not go. The idea of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] in fixing a minimum below which they can not go is clearly in the interest of the officeholder, who in this case happens to be not a citizen of the islands.

Mr. MILLER. The minimum in the amendment is not my own opinion. I inserted that at the request of gentlemen on the other side as representing their views last evening, before we adjourned. I myself would prefer to leave it entirely to the Philippine Legislature, without fixing the maximum or the minimum.

Mr. BORLAND. I am discussing the unwisdom, from my point of view, of putting in a minimum amount.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted a moment, I would like to add a word to what the gentleman from Minnesota has said. That suggestion was made from this side on yesterday evening, but I distinctly said to the gentleman a few moments ago that after further considering the matter we were not willing to accept it.

Mr. MILLER. And I distinctly made that statement, that I am representing the views of that side, last evening.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman can not now say, however, that his amendment represents the views of the majority of the committee, because it does not.

Mr. MILLER. I do not. I do not know how much the gentleman has changed since last evening.

Mr. JONES. I distinctly informed the gentleman that we had changed our minds in regard to his amendment.

Mr. MILLER. I so understand it, and have so stated at least three times.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has the floor.

Mr. TOWNER. Then, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that in my judgment his amendment will result in making it impossible for the President to ever send anybody there except a millionaire as Governor General. What we ought to do is to be very careful that we may give a sufficient sum so that men may be chosen upon their merits and not because of the size of their pocketbooks.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit one more interruption there?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. In connection with what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has said, it is interesting to recall that when Gov. Gen. Taft returned from the Philippine Islands he said to a committee of the House that the salary he was receiving made it utterly impossible for him to do justice to the position over there and save one dollar. I think the salary then was——

Mr. GORDON. Twenty thousand five hundred dollars in gold.

Mr. COOPER. Yes. He said that his statement sounded as though he had been indulging in extravagance, but he insisted that it was absolutely necessary under the conditions which obtain in the Philippine Islands to have that salary. In my judgment $18,000 is as low as we should now go.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to force my individual views upon any of the gentlemen further than to present this matter to the calm judgment of the House. There may be special reasons why in the Philippine Islands a man has to spend a large amount of money to maintain the dignity of the office of Governor General. I have heard that claim urged in regard to a great many different positions—that of foreign ambassadors, that of the governors of the different States, and other positions of that kind—that the incidental expenses required a man to draw upon his private purse, and that the salary was inadequate. We are utterly unable to determine that. It is a question of taste and of temperament, as much as anything else, so far as I can discover. We do send great men to the foreign courts of Europe on salaries infinitely less than we are fixing for this Governor General. We do have 48 great States governing themselves, some of them containing a population equal to that of the Philippine Islands, and the governor in not one of them has any such salary, to my knowledge, and in many of them the governor draws less than a third of the salary mentioned here.

I do not assume that it is possible in all cases where a man who takes an office of dignity and prominence to have enough salary furnished him to keep up the dignity of that office. I assume that there is, in a case like that of the Philippine Islands, some sort of civil list out of which the necessary expenses for the dignity of the position may be obtained outside of the personal purse of the man who occupies the office. If it is not so, it ought to be so. I see the gentleman from Minnesota shakes his head, but it ought to be so in every case where a man occupies a regal or vice-regal position. Where he is the official head of the Government, there is a civil list which aids him in carrying out those necessary duties; but I think if we make this salary $25,000 it will make it one of the greatest political plums in the United States, if not in the known civilized world. I never heard of such a position being thrown into the political arena to be scrambled for as a $25,000 Government job.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. In a moment I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio. No man in this House has a higher respect for the magnificent ability of the present Governor General of the Philippine Islands than I. I served with him in this House, and I came to recognize his great intellectual ability, his great moral courage, his splendid tact, all of his likable and attractive qualities, and his inflexible integrity in the discharge of public duties. He is a man, in my judgment, who is vastly beyond the qualifications necessary for the position. I think he has ample—and to spare—of qualifications for the position, and I cherish for him, in addition, a high personal regard and a sincere personal affection. Nothing that I say in regard to salary could be influenced pro or con by my personal feeling toward the gentleman who now occupies the position. If it were a question of personal friendship, I would be glad to vote for any amount for that man; but it is not a question of personal friendship.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. In just a moment. It is not a question of personal friendship; it is a question, among other things, of teaching these people self-control, self-restraint, self-sacrifice necessary to build up a form of government among themselves, and I do not see how we can start out with a list of $25,000 salaries for appointive men. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. The Governor of Porto Rico gets $8,000 a year. What is the difference between the duties in the Philippines and the duties there that will require such an additional salary?

Mr. BORLAND. Among other things the population of the Philippines is at least eight times that of the population of Porto Rico. It is a distant point from home, and the responsibility of the man who is on the ground is very much greater.

Mr. FESS. But would that require eight times the salary?

Mr. BORLAND. I think the salary of the Governor of Porto Rico of $8,000 is ample, and yet I know it would probably take all of that for a man to maintain the dignity of the position.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to say in reply to the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that there is a vast difference between Porto Rico and the Philippines. Porto Rico is a parallelogram of about 40 by 90 miles, whereas the Philippines——

Mr. BORLAND. I am sorry I can not yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin for that. I yield now to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I fear that the remarks of the gentleman touching the personality of the Governor General of the Philippines will leave an impression that the present Governor General of the Philippines was in some way interested in this increase of salary.

Mr. BORLAND. I should be sorry to leave that impression. From my knowledge of things I am confident that no suggestion emanated from him in regard to such increase——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. As a matter of fact——

Mr. BORLAND. I would assume that to be true, and I am confident that it is true.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We ought to be specially careful in criticizing, and as a matter of fact the Governor General of the Philippine Islands suggested the necessity that the salary, which had been heretofore $20,500 a year, should be reduced, and it was reduced to $18,000 per annum; that is, the 10 per cent in common with the others.

Mr. BORLAND. Well, that is exactly in line with my judgment of the present Governor General, and I would assume he would take that ground, without knowledge on the subject.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if the recommendation of the Governor General is to be taken, as his mature judgment, as to the amount we are required to appropriate for the administration.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. As to that I can not say.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I presume from his recommendation it must have been.

Mr. JONES. It applied, I will say, to all of their officers, 10 per cent reduction.

Mr. BORLAND. I am sorry, without asking that my time be extended, that I can not yield again. I simply want to say this, that we have got to show those people, among other things, an example of public service that may not be adequately compensated for or free government will not exist among them. Free government does not succeed unless public service is performed beyond the monetary consideration involved. And I say we are setting a wrong example to start out with a $20,000 or $25,000 appointive position and setting a new legislature at work upon that basis of salary. They will assume that as a barometer by which other salaries are to be gauged and you may be sure they will say, "This is the American scale; this is what Americans feel ought to be paid," and they will assume that that is our judgment as to conditions there in the Philippine Islands. We ought to set in this law a maximum in the interests of the taxpayers of the Philippine Islands as is set in all organic laws, or ought to be, beyond which the tax-disbursing power can not spend the people's money. Then we ought to make that limit fairly low. [Applause.]

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment. The statements of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] voice my sentiments in this matter. I do not mean by that that I shall vote for his amendment, because I shall stand by the provisions on this subject in the bill, but his ideas are sound, and if there has been any test, a real test of the sentiment of the Philippine Legislature under existing conditions, it was when, upon the recommendation of the Governor General himself, the Philippine Legislature reduced the salary of the Governor General from $20,500 to $18,000. What better test can you have than that? The cablegram of the speaker of the Philippine Legislature must yield in weight and importance to the action of the entire body. Now, from what has been said here on the floor, this committee must have learned by now, especially from the statements made by my good and much admired and appreciated friend, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], who very recently visited the islands, in almost every declaration that he has made on the floor he has constantly referred to wild men in the islands. His oft-repeated statements would lead a person to think that the only kind of people there are wild men. He has spoken every time he has arisen in his place on the floor of wild men, wild men, wild men. Wild men do not pay taxes——

Mr. MILLER. Oh, yes, they do; every one of them.

Mr. HELM. Wild men, I take it, do not own or accumulate property of any kind. They are neither captains nor malefactors of great wealth.

Mr. MILLER. Every one of them pays the cedula tax and is on the roll.

Mr. HELM. Doubtless the gentleman from Minnesota saw the wild man from Borneo. [Laughter.] The gentleman would convey the idea that it is necessary to lasso those men to get within speaking distance of them; but be that as it may, we do know, and the gentleman had informed us, that thousands and thousands of natives of the Philippine Islands wear nothing and own nothing but G strings. Do these men wear these things as a matter of style? Is it a matter of taste——

Mr. MILLER. Of taste and preference, most of them.

Mr. HELM. Or have they abundant means of buying such clothes as the gentleman from Minnesota adorns himself with——

Mr. MILLER. Oh, no.

Mr. HELM (continuing). And other people like to adorn themselves with, or are they reduced to the necessity of the simple, plain, and unadorning G string? Mindful of conditions in Ireland and India it becomes us to make the burden as light as possible. The gentleman from Minnesota and other gentlemen want to impose the magnificent salary of $25,000, raised in part by taxing these poor classes, upon a man to look after the welfare of that type of people. I say that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has presented the proper gauge and standard. The duty of this Congress is to teach lessons of frugality. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Republican side.] Yes; it is a very natural thing for the Republicans to sneer at a proposition of frugality. [Laughter.] If there has been one characteristic sin of the Republican Party it has been waste, more waste, and extravagance. That is your long suit, and a Democrat who rises upon the floor of this House and voices any other expression may expect to reap nothing but sneers and jeers at the hands of the Republicans. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say only one word in reply to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], and it was rather a pointed suggestion, that inasmuch as we give only $8,000 to the Governor of Porto Rico there is no occasion for the $18,000 or $20,000 as salary of the Governor General of the Philippines. Now, I am in favor of economy as much as is the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] or the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. However, there is no similarity between conditions in Porto Rico and conditions in the Philippines. Porto Rico is about as wide as from here to Baltimore—about 40 miles—and a little more than twice as long. In other words, it is a parallelogram of about 40 by 90 miles. Its population is homogeneous. There are no wild tribes. It is one island, and the Governor can travel all over it in one day; but in the Philippines the Governor General, in order to do his duty, must travel for weeks over many islands. An air line from the northern end of Luzon south to the southern end of the lowest of the large islands would measure more than 600 miles, and to go from island to island and go by boat, as he must of necessity do, and then to travel over the islands and visit their inhabitants, would make a journey of thousands of miles and necessitate a great deal of expenditure that would not be necessary in Porto Rico. In other respects the situation in Porto Rico and that in the Philippines differ widely. The people in the Philippines are not homogeneous. They speak several different dialects. There are wild tribes which have to be visited. The great markets of oriental trade are close at hand. The whole situation is different from that in Porto Rico, and of necessity the Governor General of the Philippines is entitled to a larger salary than is the Governor of Porto Rico.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], because I do not think the Governor General's salary should be as high as $25,000.

Mr. MILLER. I do not offer it as $25,000. I leave that to the legislature.

Mr. JONES. Not less than $25,000.

Mr. MILLER. Not less than $18,000, leaving the exact amount to be determined by the legislature.

Mr. JONES. I am opposed to the amendment, because it would permit the legislature to fix the Governor General's salary at $25,000, or even a larger sum. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], because I think that the sum of $15,000 is too small a salary for the Governor General of the Philippines.

I would like to give the House some information which I do not think it possesses. The salary of the Governor General was until recently $20,500. It became necessary last winter to cut down the expenses of the Philippine Government in order to avert an impending deficit, but Gov. Gen. Harrison would not consent to any reduction of salaries which did not include his own. The assembly, I may say to the gentleman from Minnesota, was opposed to the reduction of the salary of the Governor General. The Filipinos did not wish his salary reduced; but Gov. Gen. Harrison was not willing, as I have said, that other salaries should be reduced and his left where it was—a commendable position for him to take, I think. So the law which was passed provided that the salaries of all of the higher officials should be reduced to the extent of 10 per cent. The salary now is not just $18,000; but it is 10 per cent less than the $20,500 heretofore paid.

There are nine members of the Philippine Commission. One of them is the Governor General. Four of the others hold portfolios. They are the heads of the great departments, and each of those heads of departments had been drawing a salary of $15,000 up to last winter, when it was reduced by 10 per cent.

Mr. QUEZON. Fifteen thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. JONES. Fifteen thousand five hundred dollars. It was reduced to the extent of 10 per cent, as all other of the higher salaries, except those of the judiciary and one or two other classes, were. If the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri should be adopted, then the salary of the Governor General would be little more than the salary that the heads of the departments are receiving. This bill does not undertake to fix those salaries. They are to be continued as they are under this bill until changed by the legislature provided for in the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. JONES. Just one minute, and then I will answer the gentleman's question, if I can.

There is a vast difference, as I happen to know, between the expense necessary to maintain the position of the Governor General and that to maintain the position of a head of a department. The Governor General has to do a great deal of entertaining. He lives in an immense old Spanish palace. He has to have a large retinue of servants, a number of carriages and automobiles, and he is obliged to live in a much more lavish manner than any other official. I am quite sure that the Governor General spends more than $25,000 a year. I know that Gov. Gen. Taft out of $20,500 did not save anything, and that he was as poor a man when he came from the Philippines as he was when he went there. I do not think, therefore, that the salary ought to be reduced to the amount that the gentleman from Missouri suggests, but I do believe it would not be amiss to fix it at $20,000. I therefore suggested to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] that if he would move to amend by making it "$20,000" there would be no objection to his amendment so far as I am concerned.

Now I will answer the question of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. A few minutes ago the chairman was speaking about the salary of these other members of the commission, being executive heads of bureaus, but not having the duty of entertaining which falls upon the governor. Now, I notice in this bill that the chief justice of the supreme court gets $10,500. Would not that be a pretty fair and adequate salary for the head of the department of education, for example, or the head of the department of internal works? Is not $15,500 a pretty high salary for a member of the Philippine Commission? Could they not be well reduced in comparison with the salary of the governor?

Mr. JONES. This bill does not undertake to fix those salaries at all.

Mr. BORLAND. But it does fix the salary of the chief justice.

Mr. JONES. Yes; it does fix the salary of the chief justice, and I will tell the gentleman the reason.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not concerned in the reason, but I am speaking of the amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. I am calling the gentleman's attention to the fact that you have fixed the salary of the chief justice, who, we all agree, is a very important officer in the islands. Now, is not the salary fixed for him adequate in every way for a commissioner of education? Is it necessary that a commissioner of education shall have $15,500?

Mr. JONES. I will answer that question. Mr. Chairman, the only officials in the Philippine Islands who are appointed by the President of the United States are the Governor General and the members of the supreme court. The committee thought it was proper to fix the salaries of the appointees of the President so that they could not for any reason be changed by the legislature. We thought that these officials should be entirely independent of the legislature. The salaries of all other officials, including those of the four heads of departments, are to remain as at present until changed by the legislature. Whether they are too large or too small, I can not say, but they have been fixed at $15,500. That is the heads of departments, mark you. The heads of departments are members of the Philippine Commission and therefore members of the upper branch of the legislature, and they receive a salary as members of the upper branch of the legislature and also receive a salary as heads of those departments. The two together aggregate $15,500.

Now, that is a pretty good salary, I admit, and I rather agree with the gentleman that it is too large. But it is the present salary, and the legislature can decrease it. This bill does not undertake to say what salary shall be paid to officials who are not appointed by the President of the United States.

As to the salaries of the members of the supreme court, I do not think they are too low. I will say to the gentleman that, while I have no information on the subject, it is believed by some Filipinos that they are too high and it has been suggested to the committee that they ought to be reduced.

I wish to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who referred to the salary of the Governor of Porto Rico as being $8,000, that whilst that is true there is a bill pending in this House, which has the unanimous support of the Committee on Insular Affairs, which proposes to increase the salary of that official to $10,000. The committee unanimously agreed that the present salary was too small.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. MILLER. Is it not a fact that in this bill the old commission, as we understand it, has been discontinued, and therefore those salaries that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] speaks of as at $15,500 will disappear with them?

Mr. JONES. That is true. The legislature will then fix the salaries of the four heads of departments.

Mr. MILLER. There will be really new duties—what you might call new offices—and a corresponding readjustment of salaries?

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] will be voted down, and I more sincerely hope that the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], will be voted down. I repeat that if these amendments are voted down and any gentleman offers one to fix the salary at $20,000 instead of $18,000, I for one shall not object to it.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, both the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] have said so much regarding their ideas of the position of the Filipino people and of myself with reference to the salary of the Governor General that I believe it is time for me to say something about it myself.

Mr. Chairman, I do think that the salary of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands should be higher than it is now, and even higher than it was before that salary was reduced by the legislature, for reasons that I shall at once give to the committee. When the President of the United States was about to appoint the Governor General of the Philippine Islands I found that his concern was to find a man who was not only qualified, but also had enough private means to defray the expenses of his position. The President believed that the salary of the Governor General was such as to prevent the appointment of any but a rich man. You can readily see that with this belief in mind the President felt disposed to select his Governor General from among the wealthy men of this country. During a call I made at the White House the President told me that he was constrained to appoint a wealthy man as Governor of the Philippines, because his information was to the effect that no Governor General could live on the salary of the post. In view of these expressions we felt that we should pay the Governor General a salary high enough to permit the choice of the best man to be found for the appointment regardless of whether he be rich or poor. Thank God the President was able to find a man who, besides possessing wealth, had ability, character, and real desire to serve the Filipinos; otherwise I do not know what would have happened to us. We were more than fortunate when the President found Francis Burton Harrison, a man who had ability, character, and patriotism. [Applause.]

Of course I informed the speaker of the assembly of what had happened, and this explains why he thinks that the Governer General should have a high salary. Besides, he and I and the Filipino people know how expensive it is to fulfill the requirements of the position of the Governor General. But let not the idea enter your minds that we favor this salary for the Governor General because of our extravagant tendencies. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inform the committee—and this information is particularly pertinent in connection with the question asked by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]—that the people of the Philippine Islands have expressed through the assembly their disapproval of some of the very high salaries paid to many of the officials of the Philippine Government. I refer particularly to the secretaries of departments, who, as commissioners and secretaries, receive a total of $15,500 annually. The assembly has on several occasions tried to reduce the salaries of these officials. The Filipino people could not understand how under any circumstances such salaries as these could be defended.

Mr. BORLAND. Did I understand the gentleman to say that that was too high?

Mr. QUEZON. It is too high.

Mr. BORLAND. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. QUEZON. We think that it is absolutely indefensible for the members of the cabinet of the Governor General to be paid $15,500 when the members of the Cabinet of the President of the United States only receive $12,000 a year.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to reiterate what I said yesterday about Gov. Gen. Harrison's attitude regarding the question of his salary. The legislature would not reduce it when it reduced the salary of every other officer of the Philippine Government, but the Governor General himself thought that it must be done, since other salaries were reduced. He therefore insisted upon the action.

Mr. Chairman, I shall be frank enough to say that while I believe the salary of the Governor General is not at all sufficient unless he is given a certain amount as allowance for entertainment, I am not sure but that the salaries of the members of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands could be somewhat reduced; but I shall not ask that this be done. I wish only to make the point that there is no due proportion between the salary of the Governor General on the one hand and the members of his cabinet and the justices of the supreme court on the other.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri. I do not care to occupy more than a minute or two, because I have already expressed my feelings with respect to these salaries. Much has been said with reference to the salary enjoyed by Mr. Taft when he was Governor General. Something has been said in reference to the salary of the present Governor General, and the attitude of each is to their credit. Nothing has been said whatever in reference to another great Governor General, William Cameron Forbes, of Boston.

I want to say a word in respect to him. This may be surprising to a good many, but nevertheless it is entitled to the most serious reflection. I am told on the highest authority, so that there can be no question as to its accuracy, that during each of the four years that Mr. Forbes was Governor General of the islands he expended not less than $100,000 out of his own pocket exclusively devoted to the public welfare of the islands. Not a bit of it in regal splendor, not a bit of it in sumptuous living, not a bit of it in extravagance, not a bit of it in wastefulness, but all of it devoted exclusively to the public work and to the welfare of the Filipino people.

I think the most powerful argument that has been made to-day is that made by the gentleman from the Philippine Islands [Mr. QUEZON] when he called the committee's attention to the difficulty confronting the President of the United States in selecting a suitable person to fill the high office of Governor General. It is the same thought that has come to me time and time again, and must have come to other members of the committee. It is a sad day for us or for any people when it is necessary to fill a high office with a man of great wealth. Do not give any salary that is ridiculously high, any salary that will attract Tom, Dick, and Harry for the purpose of the salary alone. No; not that for a moment, but do give a sufficient salary so that a man who has ability, whether he is wealthy or not, can take the office and fill it respectably. That ought to be good Democratic doctrine, and I think the Members on the other side of the aisle must acknowledge that it is good Democratic doctrine.

It seems to me that the testimony so far advanced is all to the effect that the Governor General should have at least $18,000, and probably more than that, for a salary. I am willing to leave it to the Philippine Legislature. Is not that fair? Is it not really better to leave it to the people that are going to pay the bill than for us to say here what it shall be? Is it not better to leave it to the people who know the needs of the situation, rather than for us to legislate from this distant point?

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], in a very clear and emphatic manner, called attention to the distinction between the Governor of Porto Rico and the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, a powerful argument in support of my amendment. The only correction I would offer by way of suggestion is that instead of its being 600 miles from the tip north end to the tip south end, it is 1,100 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 9, after the word "other," strike out the word "help" and insert the word "employees."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to debate this amendment. I have offered it by way of suggestion, and if the chairman of the committee does not care to accept it, I do not care to urge it.

Mr. JONES. We will not oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, after the word "each," in line 25, insert: "Provided, That the term of the Governor General shall not continue beyond the term of the President of the United States by whom he shall have been appointed, or until his successor is chosen and qualified."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that proposition has already been passed upon, and the further point of order that it is not germane to this section.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman indicate wherein it has already been passed upon? Does the gentleman make reference to section 21, page 17?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is correct. It is there provided in the bill:

He shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and hold his office at the pleasure of the President and until his successor is chosen and qualified.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is germane, I think, since it follows almost literally the language just quoted by the gentleman from Tennessee, and is in entire harmony with it; it proposes, in addition, merely to fix a limitation upon the time that shall be served by the Governor General, to harmonize with the term of the President who appoints him.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, is the Chair prepared to rule upon that?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order based upon two propositions: First, that that question has already been disposed of; and, second, that it was not germane to the section now before the House. There is no doubt about it, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me. If the Chair is in doubt, I will be very glad to argue it.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. Is there not a difference, in that the amendment proposes to harmonize the tenure of office of the Governor General with that of the President of the United States who makes his appointment?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania would qualify that provision in section 21 which has already been adopted, and if at any time such an amendment were to be proposed, it should have been proposed when section 21 was under consideration.

Mr. MANN. Do not the two propositions mean the same thing? One is that the term of the Governor General shall be at the pleasure of the President of the United States, and the other is that the term of the Governor General shall end with the term of the President, if he appoints somebody else.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is not what the amendment says.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will see that under the provision of section 21 the Governor General, once appointed, remains in office at the pleasure of the President, and under this proposed amendment identically the same thing takes place. There is no distinction. There may be an argument against the adoption of the amendment. It does not say that it ends with the term of the President, but it ends when his successor has been appointed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, even if we concede that the first point I made is not well taken, the point still remains that it is not germane to this paragraph. If the gentleman desired to offer that amendment, he should have offered it at the time that we had section 21 under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not germane to this section, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 25, after the word "each," insert "Provided, That no Governor General shall be paid at the rate of $18,000 per annum to exceed the aggregate of $72,000."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a little more germane, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is a little less meaningless.

Mr. MOORE. I think it has a great deal of meaning.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, it fixes a four-year term. Is that the idea?

Mr. MOORE. That is the idea.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Chairman, it is subject to the point of order, and I make the point of order.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that in the discussion anywhere, nor in any action taken by the committee thus far——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, how many more amendments has the gentleman to this section?

Mr. MOORE. I think I have two germane amendments. I will be very frank with the gentleman. I desire to say something about the limitation of the tenure of office of the Governor General.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. MOORE. It may involve the general question of political ethics, but I think it is all pertinent to the discussion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows what good faith means. Is it a good-faith discussion of this amendment or of this bill?

Mr. MOORE. I would not offer it if I did not mean to say something in good faith to the committee. We are now discussing a bill which is fraught with great consequences to a people numbering eight million or more. We are undertaking to establish a form of government for them. We are giving them the best advice of which we are capable. We are putting to them the pretense, at least, of liberty and freedom of action on their own part, but we are adding certain strings which tie them up, and about which it seems to me we ought to inform them. If, for instance, we give the people of the Philippine Islands to believe that they shall have their freedom and independence, and their own right of action without restraint on our part, we ought to say that frankly, and we ought not to hamstring it in a way to lead them to believe that they have been deceived by the American Congress. My purpose is to discuss the matter of the tenure of office. I have an amendment pertaining to the tenure of office of those who are appointed by the President and by the Governor General.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's time is running, as I understand it.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I was answering the gentleman because he wanted to be enlightened upon the question of good faith. If the Chair is ready to rule on the point of order——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MOORE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, after the word "Philippines," in line 18, strike out the period and insert a comma and the following words: "but all officials of the Philippines appointed by the President shall hold office at the pleasure of the President and until his successor is chosen and qualified."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman make any point against that? He does not? Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment with the view of bringing to the attention of the committee the importance of our exercising good faith toward the people of the Philippine Islands. The Democratic Party is undertaking by this bill to lead the people of the Philippines to believe that the United States intends to give them their freedom and their exclusive right of government. The bill justifies that pretense as set out in the preambles, which are yet to be acted upon, but the enacting clauses of it hold the people of the Philippine Islands in check with regard to many of their so-called legislative functions. The bill reserves to the Congress and the President of the United States certain jurisdiction over the people of the Philippine Islands that they may not clearly understand if these preambles to the bill are accepted as the action of the Congress. To that extent the bill is unfair to the Filipinos themselves.

I have offered this amendment with a view of calling attention to the good faith that Congress ought to display toward these people. That question of good faith has been raised, and I have the right to suggest that, so long as it has been raised by a member of the majority party, we can refer to the action of that party not only with respect to its treatment of the Filipinos but with respect to its treatment of the people of the United States. Thus the people of the Philippine Islands may judge for themselves whether by this legislation "good faith" toward them is intended or not.

Now, I propose a limitation upon the tenure of office both for the Governor General and all local officers appointed in the Philippine Islands. On the question of good faith we have the testimony of the Democratic Party itself with respect to the tenure of office of the President of the United States. At the Baltimore convention, when the platform of that party was read, it provided:

We favor a single presidential term, and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible to reelection, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle.

So your party pledged the President of the United States "to this principle," and yet in the newspapers of yesterday morning we read—I am quoting from the New York Times—headlines as follows:

"Wilson blocked one-term bill." "Letter he wrote to A. MITCHELL PALMER in 1913 said to have sidetracked it." "It develops that House committee filed Senate measure on advice of President elect." "Silent on Baltimore plank"

Now, in the matter of "good faith" there is something for the people of the United States as well as for the people of the Philippines to consider. What are those people over yonder in those islands, whom we take by the hand to lead so they may tread by themselves—what are they to think of the "good faith" of the United States Congress passing a bill which in its preamble gives them freedom and which in its vital clauses holds them up to limitations from which they can not escape?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the gentleman from Pennsylvania attacking the present administration I was reminded of a poem which I read many years ago. Now, it may seem strange—I know it will seem strange—that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should remind anyone of poetry [laughter] in the first instance, but perhaps after the committee shall have heard the poetry to which I refer it will not seem so strange. It has been many years ago since I read it, and I do not know that I can recall the lines with exactness; but I think I can quote them with substantial accuracy. This poem read:

A LITTLE DOG.

A little dog barked at the big, round moon,
Which smiled in the evening sky,
And the natives smote him with rocks and stones,
But still he continued his rageful tones,
And he barked till his throat was dry.

Oh, the little dog bounced like a rubber ball,
For his anger quite drove him wild;
And he said, "I'm a terror, although I am small,
And I dare you, impudent fellow, to fall."
But the moon only smiled and smiled.

But at length, 'hind a cloud which obstructed the west,
The moon sank down out of sight,
And it smiled as it slowly slipped over the crest,
But the little dog said, as he laid down to rest,
"Well, I scared him away, all right."

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The last recourse of a man who has no argument is ridicule, and ridicule is one of the best arguments that can be employed by one who has no other means to stop an adversary. The gentleman has quoted his little-dog poem, not literally, but he has so quoted it as to present no possible argument at all upon the question at issue. The gentleman knew I did not have the time in which to fully explain the question I desired to raise a little while ago, but he has aroused me now sufficiently to say to him that his little-dog argument has no special effect upon me, since I am endeavoring to do my duty by the people, and am endeavoring honestly to inform the Filipinos, for whom we are legislating, as to just what the intended legislation is.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has not said a word about the sudden change of front of the Democratic Party, for which he speaks, upon the question of one term for the President. The gentleman knows that in the Baltimore platform, which was the gospel of his party, it was provided that the President of the United States should have one term and that the party pledged its candidate to one term. The gentleman also knows that there has been a change of front since that party platform was adopted, and that the President himself has sent to the Judiciary Committee of this House a notification that he does not desire that party platform observed. This is in line with other instances of pledge-breaking by the Democratic Party, as, for instance, in the matter of the Panama Canal tolls. The Democratic Party pledged this Nation that ships should pass through the Panama Canal free. It went back on that pledge; it reneged on that pledge; and it now has to resort to "Little dog Tray" to excuse it for its bad faith to the American people.

The Democratic Party has done more than this. It has recently brought out its textbook for the use of orators to go out and again fool the American people. And in this textbook, from cover to cover, there is not one line of the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore upon which the Democratic Party deceived the people of the United States in the election of 1912. Apparently the party does not now stand upon that platform. Oh, if you will deceive 90,000,000 people in this way on the Panama Canal plank and the one-term presidential plank, what will you do with these civilized and semicivilized millions of people in the Philippine Islands to whom you are making promises to-day? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does the Chair understand that the debate on this bill ought to be confined to the subject matter of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then I would like to inquire by what means did this gentleman get the right to utter this tirade we have been obliged to listen to?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Connecticut had wanted to interrupt the gentleman from Pennsylvania he could have done so when he was speaking.

Mr. DONOVAN. It is remarkable what an intellectual gentleman will do. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 24, lines 11 and 12, by striking out the words "and approved by the Governor General."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "and approved by the Governor General."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill. The language of this section provides that all of the officials and employees not named by the President shall have salaries to be fixed by the Philippine Legisalture, as I understand it, and to be approved by the Governor General.

Now, the only way the Philippine Legislature can act is by passing a bill, and we have already provided in this bill that the Governor General may veto a bill passed by the legislature, and also provided a method by which that bill can be passed over the veto if it shall be approved by the President. Now comes this provision specifically requiring that the salaries of all these officials shall be approved by the Governor General. There is an apparent conflict in the two provisions of this bill, and under this language, if this remains in, any bill which is passed by the Philippine Legislature fixing a salary can not be passed over the veto of the Governor General, even if it be approved by the President. Was that the design of the committee, may I ask, or is that something that was taken out of the present law?

Mr. JONES. I do not think that was the idea of the committee. So far as I am concerned, I see no objection to the elimination of that language.

Mr. MANN. Well, it seemed to me there was a conflict. I think it is already covered fully, and I am afraid this would make trouble.

Mr. JONES. The committee did not think, of course, there was any conflict; but I am willing to put the matter beyond any question of doubt.

Mr. MANN. I think this, probably, may be in the existing law.

Mr. JONES. That is.

Mr. MANN. Well, of course, under the existing law there is no way of passing a bill over the veto of the Governor General, as I understand, and you have already provided for that.

Mr. JONES. I think there will be no objection on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in lines 12, 13, and 14, on page 24, the language:

And if the legislature shall fail to make an appropriation for such salaries the salaries so fixed shall be paid without the necessity of further appropriations therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, lines 12, 13, and 14, strike out the following language: "And if the legislature shall fail to make an appropriation for such salaries, the salaries so fixed shall be paid without the necessity of further appropriations therefor."

Mr. MANN. Is there not in the bill a provision that if an appropriation act shall not be passed that the former appropriation——

Mr. JONES. That is applied to the general appropriation act.

Mr. MANN. That is true. But here, supposing the Philippine Legislature wants to discontinue an office that ought to be discontinued? We know our method frequently is not to make an appropriation for that office, and it may be—and is true—that in legislative bodies it is sometimes much easier to drop an appropriation from an appropriation bill where it ought to be dropped than it is to pass a bill repealing the law that created the office.

Now, what objection can there be to leaving the appropriation for these offices created by the Philippine Legislature to the Philippine Legislature when it comes to providing the salaries? Certainly there is no desire on the part of anybody, if there is a useless office over there, to continue to pay the salary of the office, although the Philippine Legislature may refuse to make the appropriation for it. If they fail to pass the appropriation bills, as I understand, these salaries will be continued anyhow; that is, if an appropriation bill does not pass this year, then the appropriation act of last year remains in force. But this would seem to prevent the opportunity to discontinue a useless office, and we who have been here very long know that it is a very difficult matter to do at the best, and I do not believe in discouraging a legislative body that can find it can do without a job.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. Calling the gentleman's attention to the language on page 15, the provision is as follows:

If at the termination of any fiscal year the appropriations necessary for the support of government for the ensuing fiscal year shall not have been made, the several sums appropriated in the last appropriation bills for the objects and purposes therein specified, so far as the same may be done, shall be deemed to be reappropriated for the several objects and purposes specified in said last appropriation bill: and until the legislature shall act in such behalf the treasurer shall, when so directed by the Governor General, make the payments necessary for the purposes aforesaid.

That would allow the continuation of the appropriation for the salaries of officers. That would certainly be for the support of the government.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; if no appropriation is made, then these appropriations are continued in force.

Mr. TOWNER. So that the language used in this section that the gentleman moves to strike out is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. MANN. I take it that this provision was in the existing law. I do not know and have not ascertained, but I take it that it was for the very purpose of preventing the lower house over there from refusing to pay the salaries; but I do not think that applies now.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that it is in existing law, and also that provision in section 15 is in existing law, with a certain modification.

Mr. MANN. I understand. But does not the gentleman think that we can afford to trust the Philippine Legislature to make the appropriations for those salaries for offices they create when the salaries are necessary and when the offices are necessary to be continued?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say I have no doubt he has in mind especially clerical places and things of that sort; but if this were stricken out, if you strike out the salary of the head of a bureau or a high executive officer, would it not——

Mr. MANN. Well, even then, if the Philippine Legislature should conclude that a certain high place can be abolished which it has created, why should it not be permitted to do that? That is not going very far in self-government. For instance, supposing that we want to change an office, as we do sometimes here in Washington, discontinue one office and create another office. Under the terms of this, if you wanted to create an office you could, but you could not discontinue an office by dropping the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I call the gentleman's attention to the language on page 20, beginning in line 9:

There shall be established by the Philippine Legislature a bureau, to be known as the bureau of non-Christian tribes, which said bureau shall be embraced in one of the executive departments to be designated by the Governor General, and shall have general supervision over the public affairs of the inhabitants of the territory represented in the legislature by appointive senators and representatives.

Now, the gentleman knows, of course, the delicacy of dealing with the non-Christian tribes in the Philippine Islands. I should not like to make it possible—I should rather go to the extent of tautology, if that were necessary—to prevent the possibility of the Philippine Legislature, if it should desire to do what I do not think it would desire to do, to abolish this bureau.

Mr. MANN. Well, I quite agree with the gentleman about that. But supposing the Philippine Legislature did not create this bureau?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This act creates it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. It says, "There shall be established by the Philippine Legislature a bureau." Suppose the Philippine Legislature did not create the bureau. We are not passing all power out of our hands, and that is why the gentleman knows the Philippine Legislature will create the bureau, because if the Philippine Legislature did not create the bureau and Congress wanted it, Congress would create it. We have the power at any time, and if the Philippine Legislature would create a bureau by direction of the organic act and fail to make an appropriation for it, we would have the power to do it. I do not think there is any chance of their failing.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We also continue the laws in existence. I would rather not take two bites at the cherry, seeing how difficult it is to take one bite.

Mr. MANN. I do not think we shall have to take two bites, but it seems to me that it is desirable to leave the power in the legislature to create and abolish a salary when they think it is a useless office. We know sometimes it is very effective here, and we know also that it is a frequent thing in the appropriation acts here to leave out one office, the title of ar office, and to reestablish it under another title with slightly changed jurisdiction. Under the terms of this provision I do not know whether that could be done. I doubt it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, of course the gentleman understands that they can carry that provision in the appropriation bill, and if the Governor General should veto that item, it would not become a law. But there is nothing here to prohibit them from abolishing the office if it became a law.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing to prevent them from passing a law and abolishing the office.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. They can do that upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. That will depend upon their rules. They will probably have rules something like ours, where legislation on an appropriation act is not permissible. I venture to say that if this provision were in our Constitution it would have cost our Government many millions of dollars, and often a large sum of money on any appropriation bill.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I think that section of this bill which permits the continuation of a previous appropriation in case the legislature should fail to pass a new measure is enough protection against the danger that the government of the Philippine Islands might be left without any means of support. I do not think that this language should be retained if it leaves a doubt as to the power of the legislature to abolish unnecessary bureaus or offices.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that I do not think there is any necessity for striking this out, but personally I have no objection to doing it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, an amendment is pending, by unanimous consent, from yesterday—section 23a.

Mr. JONES. I suggest that we finish these two sections first.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought it was the understanding that we take it up after the consideration of this was completed.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. It was to be referred to by unanimous consent?

Mr. STAFFORD. By agreement, Mr. Chairman. It can be returned to by agreement.

Mr. BRYAN. Unanimous consent has been granted to go back; but to continue it on the calendar as it is, unanimous consent is not necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have it considered at the present time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JONES. Very well. Go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new section, section 26a, the following:

"The sale, manufacture for sale, transportation for sale, importation for sale, and exportation for sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes in the Philippine Islands and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof are forever prohibited. The Philippine Legislature shall have power to provide for the manufacture, sale, importation, and transportation of intoxicating liquors for sacramental, medicinal, mechanical, pharmaceutical, or scientific purposes, or for use in the arts, and shall have power to enforce this article by all needful legislation."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which is offered is the Hobson amendment providing for national prohibition in its identical wording, excepting that "the Philippines" is substituted in place of "the United States." I am as much opposed to the original Hobson national prohibition amendment extending over the entire United States as I am to this amendment, which limits it to the Philippines. The principle in both cases is the same. The National Government has no right to legislate on a matter of purely State or internal policy.

There is a fundamental principle under our form of government that matters pertaining to the health, happiness, and internal affairs of a State are for the State to pass upon through its legislature. So in the bill under consideration we are following out that idea and vesting in the Philippine Legislature the right to legislate on all matters pertaining to the welfare of the Filipino people.

No question is better recognized as being a matter of local concern than the regulation of the liquor traffic, and nothing is better established in the history of liquor regulations than that where a State attempts to force prohibition upon a people in a community where the sentiment is lacking for its enforcement that prohibition becomes a farce and a dead letter. This is evidenced in the New England States in trying to enforce prohibition in New Hampshire, Vermont, and Maine when public opinion was averse to it. Every Member of Congress from Vermont with whom I have ever spoken admits, even though they themselves have been teetotalers, that conditions are far better under the present system of local option than under the former system of State-wide prohibition. The people who are not fanatical on this subject have no question that the conditions in Maine would be far better than under the farcical enforcement, or, rather, lack of enforcement, of the State prohibitory law.

Believing as I do in the principle of local government, and this bill being bottomed on that idea of granting to the Philippines the greatest amount of government that is compatible with its welfare, is the reason why I make a point of order against this obnoxious amendment to the freedom of action of the Filipino people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself for a few minutes to the parliamentary proposition. A point of order was made against this prohibition amendment by me last night, and I renew it again on the ground that it is not germane either to the provisions of the bill or to the paragraph or section of the bill we are now considering.

I wish first to direct the Chairman's attention to the title of the bill. It is a bill to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

If the Chair will scan the various provisions in the bill we have thus far considered, he will find first a bill of rights, then a statement of the legislative authority of the islands, the powers of the legislature, then the powers of the Executive, and now we virtually have concluded the consideration of all those matters and are considering merely the question of appointments to some of the executive positions.

The Chair is acquainted with clause 7 of Rule XVI, which provides that no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I would not contend that if at the proper place, for instance section 6, an amendment had been offered reserving to the Congress of the United States the power to pass upon the liquor question, or excepting that power from the legislative authority conferred upon the Philippine Legislature, that it would not have been germane; or to that section which relates to the powers of the Governor General that he should have authority as to the administration of the liquor traffic in the Philippine Islands; but I do contend, first, that there is nothing to this bill to indicate to any Member of the House that a prohibition amendment was likely to be considered, forbidding the sale and manufacture of liquors in the Philippine Islands. For the Chair to hold that this amendment is in order the Chair would have to hold that an amendment I might introduce extending the provisions of the Underwood tariff bill to be the internal policy of the Philippines would be in order. It would also, if I offered an amendment fixing the Glass-Owen currency bill as the currency to be established in the Philippine Islands, have to be held in order, or if I should offer an amendment providing that an appropriation for rivers and harbors shall be to the extent of $20,000,000 annually appropriated by Congress, would also have to be held in order.

But there is nothing in any part of this bill, from beginning to end, which attempts to determine the legislative policy by the Congress as to its internal or external policy.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does not the gentleman think that a question of this character affecting the internal policy of the government should be left to the legislature?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question as to the merits of the proposition, as I have just stated, that it should be left entirely to the legislature as a matter of home rule. The bill is predicated on the idea that the Filipinos are capable of governing themselves, and if they are, it should be left to them to determine their internal policy. No more should Congress determine the policy in the Philippines as to the liquor traffic, if we are transferring all legislative authority over their affairs to a constituted legislative body, than that Congress should determine as a national question national prohibition, where State legislatures exist, with the full power to determine what is best for the State's own welfare. But this amendment is part and parcel of the movement for national prohibition, and, believing as I do, that that Government is best which comes nearest to the people, and that States through their legislatures should determine their internal affairs, I intend to use my best endeavors to defeat this prohibition amendment.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. As a matter of revenue for the people of the Philippines, should not they be allowed to decide that question for themselves?

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, yes; just as I have argued that it would not be in harmony with the provisions of this bill for any Member to offer the provisions of the Underwood tariff and say that it should be applicable as a tariff policy for the Philippine Islands, and that is what this amendment is seeking to accomplish.

Why there are some Members who, as long as it does not affect their districts, would impose conditions on others that would be harsh and unworkable and absolutely work an injustice. It is no concern to them as to the revenues that will result, and even now, as the gentlemen know, there is a strong movement to impose on the beer industry a greater burden than it justly should bear. No objection was made by the beer-consuming public to a reasonable tax of 50 cents additional per barrel on beer to meet any possible deficit that might arise by reason of the European war, though from my point of view I consider that no such exigency exists, and accordingly have opposed this war-revenue bill. But it is now proposed to increase this by one-half and make the tax $1.75 per barrel, which would make the beer-consuming public pay nearly $50,000,000, or about one-half of the total tax to be raised to meet the deficiency. This I consider most unjust, especially as it is a substitute for the gasoline tax, which would have to be paid by the automobile users.

Let no one mistake the effect of this tax in that by raising the price of beer to the saloon keeper and to the thousands of people who purchase cases of bottled beer for home consumption that its ultimate effect by increasing the price to the consuming public will be to lessen the production of this beverage that is regarded as almost nonintoxicating. This burden will fall upon the poor man and not the rich, as beer is a poor man's drink, and when the defenders of this war-revenue bill claim that this tax is upon luxuries they are strangers entirely to the conditions and are imposing a burden that will be most directly felt by the working and middle classes. When $48,000,000 additional beer tax is to be thus levied I protest and will continue to protest that it is unjust, inequitable, and sectional in its character.

Mr. Chairman, the supporters of this amendment are forcing their views upon others with no voice to oppose, against which, as a Representative of a district of liberty-loving people, I strongly protest. I am not in sympathy with any rule of absolutism that would take away the liberty of the individual.

I have digressed somewhat from the discussion of the parliamentary question, but this digression was suggested by the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN].

Now, I wish to direct the chairman's attention to one or two brief statements in the manual under clause 7 of Rule XVI, and particularly to subclause D, on page 344, which says that two subjects are not necessarily germane because they are related.

The first reference thereunder is this (these were held to be not germane):

To a proposition relating to the terms of Senators an amendment changing the manner of their election; to a bill relating to commerce between the States an amendment relating to commerce within the several States; to a proposition for the appointment of a select committee to investigate a certain subject an amendment proposing an inquiry of the executive on that subject.

I wish to direct the attention of the Chair to the latest expression—and perhaps the Chair was present when the Representative from New York, Mr. JOHN J. FITZGERALD, whom we all regard as one of the best parliamentarians in this body, was chairman of the committee on September 22 last in the consideration of the conservation bill providing for the leasing of coal, oil, and mineral lands of the country. There was a special provision under consideration for the disposition of the funds or rentals accruing from those Government lands when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offered an amendment that the funds should be used for the purpose of the building of good roads.

I know of no decision anywhere on the subject of germaneness that is so comprehensive and so enlightening as this decision of Mr. FITZGERALD. In that opinion he states that it had been intimated that the question would arise, and he had given the subject, as the opinion shows, considerable thought and consideration.

I direct the Chair's attention to that decision, and particularly to certain language in it. The gist of the decision is, as to the question of germaneness, whether the amendment that is offered could reasonably be anticipated, or could the Members consider that the amendment would be a logical sequence of the provisions of the bill.

I wish to read the following:

The meaning of the word "germane" is akin to, or near to, or appropriate to, or relevant to, and "germane" amendments must bear such relationship to the provisions of the bill as well as meet the other tests; that is, that they be a natural and logical sequence to the subject matter and propose such modifications as would naturally, properly, and reasonably be anticipated.

Again, on page 15553, Mr. FITZGERALD said:

If it be apparent that the amendment proposes some modification of the bill, or of any part of it, which from the declared purposes of the bill could not reasonably have been anticipated and which can not be said to be a logical sequence of the matter contained in the bill, and is not such a modification as would naturally suggest itself to the legislative body considering the bill, the amendment can not be said to be germane.

In his concluding remarks he said:

It seems to the Chair that, applying these tests to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to determine whether it is germane, the question to be answered is whether the amendment is relevant, appropriate, and a natural and logical sequence to the subject matter of the bill. It is quite clear to the Chair that the amendment can not be so characterized, and that the committee could not have anticipated or reasonably expected that to a proposition that the money to be derived from the royalties of the leases authorized to be made under this legislation should be put in the reclamation fund, a well-established fund created for specific and definite purposes; that a proposition to create a new fund, to be known as the "national good-roads fund," could be considered as a natural, appropriate, relevant, and logical sequence to the proposal in the bill; and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Again, here is a pertinent suggestion by Mr. FITZGERALD that may be of some value to the Chair in this matter, to be found on page 15555, near the top of the first column:

Very frequently the difficulty in reaching a conclusion as to whether an amendment is germane arises from the fact that while the proposed amendment is somewhat similar to the subject matter of the bill, the particular predilection of Members favorable to the amendment makes them reason themselves into a frame of mind to believe the amendment to be germane without careful analysis of its relation to the matter proposed to be amended. * * * It seems to the Chair that such proposals could not reasonably be anticipated, nor could they be held as logical sequences to the provision in the bill.

Following out the logic of that opinion—and I repeat that I consider it the best opinion that has ever been delivered upon this subject of germaneness—I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the prohibitory amendment now proposed, which seeks to determine the legislative policy of the Philippines in advance, could not have been anticipated as naturally being a relevant proposition to the consideration of this bill. No more so than if some Member would offer the Underwood Tariff Act, as I suggested a moment ago, to determine the tariff policy of the Philippine Islands. This bill is founded entirely, from first to last, on the fundamental idea that the Philippines themselves shall determine through their legislature their internal and external policies.

I now wish merely to come to this other question, and that is, if it might have been in order, if the Chair should hold that it is germane to other provisions of the bill, it can not be held to be germane to this section. The amendment embodies a legislative policy, and it is a fundamental rule of germaneness that the paragraph must be germane to the section under consideration. If the Chair desires any authority upon that I have some authorities along that line. In Hinds' Precedents, Volume V, paragraph 5822, we find this language:

An amendment inserting an additional section should be germane to the portion of the bill where it is offered.

As the Chair knows, the reason for that is predicated upon the idea of expedition in the consideration of bills. If a Member should be granted freedom at any time, anywhere, to introduce any amendment to the body of the bill, there would be no end to the consideration of that measure in case some Member should wish to indulge in a filibuster. Assuming that the amendment is germane to the general provisions of the bill, then I contend it should have been offered to that section of the bill which relates to the legislative power, but the section under consideration here does not relate to the legislative powers. The powers of the Philippine Legislature were referred to in sections 3 and 6, prior sections of the bill.

Just to make a brief résumé, I do not contend, Mr. Chairman, that if an amendment had been offered at the proper place, stating that the Philippine Legislature could not have authority to pass upon the liquor question, that that would not have been in order at that place, nor do I contend that it would not have been in order if an amendment delegating that authority to the Governor General had been offered, but I do contend that it is foreign to the whole scope of this bill to introduce a legislative enactment that shall apply to the Philippine Islands direct. The title of the bill and every paragraph in it shows that that was not the policy or intent of the committee in introducing it, and that no Member of the House could reasonably anticipate that any such proposition would be submitted for consideration.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, briefly on the point of order, I am very glad that the point is to be submitted to a gentleman who can not be influenced by the suggestions of revenue or suggestions of home rule, coming, as he does, from the State of Virginia, for there the gentleman has heard all of these arguments and has passed on those matters outside of this Chamber. This bill states in the title that it is a bill to provide a more autonomous government for the Philippine Islands. The fact that it grants rights to the Philippine Islands, privileges to the Legislature of the Philippine Islands, necessarily carries with it that it reserves from the legislature such rights and such privileges and such large powers as this Congress may deem wise to reserve from that legislature. We can not grant these rights without reserving the rights that we do not grant, and under that broad head of granting a more autonomous government we are here to determine what constitutes a more autonomous government. We are here to determine where we are going to restrict and where we are going to extend privileges. Page 9 of the bill, section 12, provides that all local legislative powers of the Philippines, "except as herein otherwise provided," shall be vested in the legislature. "Except as herein otherwise provided.". That is the purpose of the bill—to make provisions otherwise wherever it is the will of Congress to do so. We begin right at the very first of the bill and provide that they shall not pass laws abridging life, liberty, and property, and then we pass another section restraining the Philippine Legislature from denying to an accused person the right of counsel, and we deny them the right to pass any law that puts any person twice in jeopardy, and we restrict their rights as to passing laws concerning bail and obligations of contract and imprisonment for debt and the right of habeas corpus.

We regulate taxes and we provide how far they can go on the subject to taxation. All through the bill these provisions and restrictions are set forth. It is just as much a bill to restrict the legislature to reserve rights as it is to grant those that we may choose to give to the legislature. The gentleman from Wisconsin, in his argument on behalf of the point of order, suggests that if this were permitted in the form which he has stated at a different place, it perhaps would be in order. Now, the place where my amendment is submitted, or, rather, the point raised will attain with less force at the place where it is submitted, it seems to me, than any other place in the bill. This section 26 deals with franchises, concessions from the government of the islands to private parties, to corporations, to licensees, to those who come to the government and ask for privileges from the government. The gentleman who sits in the chair well knows that the United States Supreme Court has held that no man has the inherent right to sell intoxicating liquor, no man has the right to sell these debauching drugs to the public, and that sales of liquors are restricted on that ground, and every corporation, every State, every municipality has the inherent right to fix licenses and state conditions under which franchises will be given. Now, in these sections we have provided how franchises on the public domain, how franchises on the public land, how franchises of public utilities are to be granted, under what condition water rights will be granted, under what conditions we will allow the right to furnish gas to a municipality to be granted to a private concern. All of these grants, all of these concessions, all of these franchises are made the subject of regulations in this very preceding section. Now, Mr. Chairman, that point, of course, would not be resorted to except in the most extreme case, and the most liberal interpretation would be due in reference to that feature, but by a strict interpretation this is the very place for this amendment. This is the very location for it, and it is an independent section, not an amendment to any other section, and I submit to the Chair that there is no rhyme or reason in the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I submit that this committee has the right, without any shadow of question, without any thought in any parliamentarian's mind, sincerely and earnestly I believe that this committee has the right to say to the Philippine Legislature that we shall not permit the grant of this liquor franchise if they see fit to so do, and that this is the very place in the bill to say it, if we care to say it at all.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], makes two points of order against the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN]. First, that the amendment is not germane to the bill, and therefore is not in order under any circumstances. Second, that if it is germane to the bill, it is not germane to the portion of the bill under consideration, and hence is not in order at this time. Many decisions have been rendered upon the subject of germane, and nongermane amendments. Some of these decisions are plainly right, and easily referable to established principles. Others rest upon the most subtle and hairsplitting distinctions. Still others are flatly contradictory, and hopelessly irreconcilable. Should the first objection to the pending amendment be sustained, the ruling of the Chair would, in effect, be a declaration that the amendment presents a proposition unrelated to the subject matter of the bill. But is such the case? It is true that we find in the title of the bill a statement that this measure is intended to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, but it is further stated, that the bill is to provide a more autonomous government for the islands. In pursuance of, and in conformity with the latter declaration, the bill deals in great detail with the internal affairs, and domestic economy of the Philippine people. Section 3 affords many positive rights to the people of these islands, limits in many directions the powers of the Philippine Legislature, and contains many inhibitions relating to procedure, practices, and pursuits. For instance it is declared in this section, that neither slavery, nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist in said islands.

If it is in harmony with the purpose of this bill, to provide that a state of slavery, and the traffic in human liberty, shall not exist in the Philippines, it is not perceived why an inhibition directed against the manufacture of, and the traffic in ardent spirits, is not in order under, and directly related to, the subject matter of this section which is intended to establish by law and make effective certain fundamental principles deemed essential to the future welfare, prosperity, and progress of the Filipinos. The first objection of the gentleman from Wisconsin is overruled, the Chair being of opinion that the amendment under consideration is plainly germane to the bill. The second objection of the gentleman from Wisconsin presents a more difficult question for determination. Conceding pro arguendo, that the amendment is germane to the bill, it is insisted that it is not in order in the connection in which it is offered, in other words that it is not in harmony so to say, with its proposed environment. While the decisions relating to germaneness in this connection are conflicting, yet on the whole it may be considered as fairly established, that an amendment of this character, should be germane to the portion of the bill where it is offered. Hence it follows that to be in order, this amendment should be offered in its appropriate connection, unless it falls within the principle relating to amendments that are germane to the bill, and in some degree germane to different sections thereof. In that event the proponent of the amendment may select the connection in which he will offer it. See Fifth Hinds, sections 5822, and 5823.

Looking to the section of the pending bill which the proposed amendment is to follow, as a new section, it will be apparent that this amendment is in no wise germane to that section. If the Chair were not assured in his mind that the amendment is germane to section 3 of the bill which has been passed, so that full opportunity has been afforded to offer the same at a time when it was plainly, clearly, and positively in order; or if the Chair were of opinion that it was germane to more than one section of the bill, including the connection in which it is now offered, the Chair would have no hesitation in holding the same to be now in order. But the Chair is not in doubt either on the first, or the second point. The amendment was plainly germane to section 3, and therefore appropriate to be offered in that connection. It is not germane to section 26 which it is intended to succeed as a new section. Hence it falls within the rule that an amendment inserted as an additional section, should be germane to that portion of the bill where it is offered. (5 Hinds, sec. 5822.) The Chair sustains the second point of order raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 188. Joint resolution ceding to the State of California temporary jurisdiction over certain lands in the Presidio of San Francisco and Fort Mason (Cal.) Military Reservations.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 29. That all laws or parts of laws applicable to the Philippines not in conflict with any of the provisions of this act are hereby continued in force and effect.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to argue the matter, but I am going to offer the amendment I suggested here—the prohibition amendment—after section 27, and I shall do so in every section from now on.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment has not been reported, and of course I can not make the point of order, but the gentleman can not proceed with debate until his amendment is reported.

Mr. BRYAN. We have had the amendment read. It is the same as was read a moment ago, except it is to come after section 27 instead of section 26.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] asks unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I presume the waiving of the reading will not interfere with my making a point of order. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment offered is not germane to this section, and, furthermore, it has already been passed upon and is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 29. That all laws or parts of laws applicable to the Philippines not in conflict with any of the provisions of this act are hereby continued in force and effect.

Mr. JONES and Mr. TOWNER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized.

Mr. TOWNER. I ask the attention of the chairman of the committee. I ask unanimous consent to return to section 22, on page 20.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, before that return is made, may I ask if section 29 has been read? I want to offer an amendment after section 29.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have somebody move for the reconsideration of that section. Somebody who voted against that amendment should move its reconsideration.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the gentleman withhold his request for the present. There are two sections that we are to return to, and I would like to perfect those before we take up anything new.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the section I offered awhile ago I would offer now as section No. 30. There is an old adage that it is never too late to do good. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. STAFFORD. Without waiving the right to make the point of order against it, I do not object. I now make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this section of the bill, and, further, I make the point of order that the amendment is dilatory.

Mr. BRYAN. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to be heard briefly on that. This is entirely a different proposition. This amendment is offered here as section 30. The distinguished gentleman who has just left the chair held that the proposition was germane to this bill, but that it was not germane when being put in as section 26a, between these various propositions that were involved there; but here is a section—section 29—which says:

That all laws or parts of laws applicable to the Philippines not in conflict with any of the provisions of this act are hereby continued in force and effect.

Now, what is germane to that? What is the proposition that is involved in that section? That is a proposition as to what laws shall be continued in force, what laws shall be repealed, and what laws shall be observed from now on in the Philippine Islands. There is nothing there about public lands, there is nothing there about salaries to officers, there is nothing there about these propositions that the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin presented a while ago and on which he obtained the ruling from the able Chairman who was presiding at that time. Not at all. The amendment I have proposed is applicable to that section, which says:

That all laws or parts of laws applicable to the Philippines not in conflict with any of the provisions of this act are hereby continued in force and effect.

Now, that is a very broad subject. That is as broad a subject as all the enactments that we have heretofore made in regard to the Philippine Islands. It involves the question of involuntary servitude, which the gentleman spoke of a few moments ago. He said if I had put it with involuntary servitude I could have gotten it through, or some crime or criminality, such as the peddling of opium, or of vice, in the Philippine Islands. But here is a section that involves everything you can think of, although it mentions no particular subject; and I would like to know why I can not offer it here. We have here a House composed to a great extent of Members from dry States, and is it possible that this House is going on record by saying that it is right to refuse to permit Congress to consider a prohibition amendment as to even the Philippine Islands? I hope that such is not the case. I hope it will not be laid against the record of the gentleman who sits in the chair now that he ruled that as to this proposed section 30 of the Philippine bill it was out of order in this Congress of the United States of America to incorporate a provision denying the peddling of liquor by infamous men in the Philippine Islands, who are debauching the men of those islands with liquor. I hope the Chair will not rule that an amendment restraining those people and putting them out of business is out of order. I hope the Chair will not rule that way. I hope he will never have to explain such a ruling as that to his constituents. I hope that no Member of this House will have to make such an explanation to his constituents. I would not want to go back home and make such an explanation. The laws that are in force over there—and there are any number of them—and the matter of passing such laws or incorporating such laws on the books have been discussed and considered. When we went over there it was said the Filipinos were not in the habit of drinking whisky and alcohol to any great extent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not arguing the point of order but arguing the merits.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Milwaukee thinks that everything is in order from Milwaukee——

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; I do not hold that everything is in order. I believe we should confine ourselves to the rules of the House.

Mr. BRYAN. I am ready to submit, if the Chair please.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to return to section 18, on page 13. The right to return to that section has been reserved. I desire to move to strike out the word "next," in line 22 of that section, and to insert the word "next" after the word "October," in line 21, so that it will read:

On the 16th day of October next following the election.

Instead of:

On the 16th day of October following the next election.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the unanimous consent is to return to this section merely for the purpose of offering this amendment?

Mr. JONES. That one amendment; yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, when that amendment is offered, I would like also to be permitted to offer this prohibition amendment.

Mr. JONES. Consent was given specifically to offer this amendment and none other.

Mr. BRYAN. Then I will withdraw the proposition so far as that section is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 21, after the word "October," insert the word "next." Line 22, after the word "the," strike out the word "next."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Virginia about a cognate matter, possibly?

Mr. BRYAN. Cognac?

Mr. MANN. What is cognac? I know what "cognate" means. I suppose the gentleman from Washington is familiar with the "juice," however. [Laughter.] On page 16, in reference to the election of the Resident Commissioners, was that entirely changed? It is section 20.

Mr. JONES. Leave was given to return to that section. It is on page 17, in section 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to return to page 17, section 20. Permission was given to return to that section for this specific purpose. I desire to strike out the word "twenty-one," which was inserted as an amendment to line 5. The committee amended line 5 by striking out "nineteen" and inserting "twenty-one." I now move to strike out the word "twenty-one" and insert "twenty-two."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 5, strike out the word "twenty-one" and insert the word "twenty-two."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Virginia if the term has been fixed at six years for the Resident Commissioners?

Mr. JONES. Yes; it has been fixed at six years.

Mr. MANN. Of course the gentleman has had his attention called to the fact that, as the bill read before, there was an interim?

Mr. JONES. Yes. The attention of the Chairman was called to that fact by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. We have gone back to correct that. Now, the effect of this amendment is to extend the first term of the Commissioners for about two months. After that it will be six years.

Mr. MANN. May I ask another question? On page 16, line 16, it reads:

Each of said Resident Commissioners shall, in addition to the salary and expenses now allowed by law, be allowed the same sum for stationery and for the pay of necessary clerk hire as is now allowed to the Members of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Has that been changed?

Mr. JONES. That has not been changed.

Mr. MANN. Should not the word "mileage" be inserted before "expenses"?

Mr. JONES. No; because there is a special act which gives the Commissioners $2,000 in lieu of mileage.

Mr. MANN. I know; so that it would read "mileage expenses." They get a stationery account, and they get clerk hire. You do not want to duplicate that?

Mr. JONES. No; we do not want to duplicate that.

Mr. MANN. It says, "in addition to the salary and expenses now allowed by law," which includes stationery and clerk hire, they shall be allowed "the same sum for stationery and for the pay of necessary clerk hire as is now allowed to the Members of the House of Representatives of the United States." Now, if we should insert, before the word "expenses," the word "mileage," it would read, "in addition to the salary and mileage expenses now allowed by law," and so forth. That would fix it. They should be allowed stationery and clerk hire. Otherwise you duplicate the stationery and mileage account.

Mr. JONES. I do not think it would be proper to put in the word "mileage," because a lump sum is allowed now in lieu of mileage.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I understand; but it is mileage expenses. It would be called "mileage expenses." They are now allowed, as Members of Congress are, mileage expenses, except that there is a fixed sum; and they are also allowed a stationery account and a clerk-hire account. Those expenses they are now allowed.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is asking unanimous consent, then——

Mr. MANN. No; I was asking if that was inserted.

Mr. JONES. The suggestion of the gentleman is that instead of "expenses" it should read, "the sums now allowed in lieu of mileage.' I see no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. Yes; so that it would not duplicate the stationery and clerk-hire account.

Mr. JONES. That is what the word "expenses" was meant to cover. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, then——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has another amendment pending.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment.

A little while ago the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] made a statement which, it appears to me, ought not to be allowed to go unchallenged. His attack on the Democratic Party should be refuted. And inasmuch as no gentleman on that side of the House has seen fit to answer it, I want to call attention to it for just a moment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] criticizes the Democratic campaign textbook because it does not contain the Baltimore platform.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing this amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I hope the gentleman will not do that now for two or three minutes. He will not make progress if he does.

Mr. JONES. I hope the gentleman——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will get through in three minutes.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman was frank enough yesterday to ask to be allowed to proceed out of order. I never knew of a gentleman to make a request like that before. Now, he is proceeding to do without permission what he asked permission to do yesterday, when permission was granted.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience for three minutes, I will agree to quit.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will agree to quit permanently, all right. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Not permanently, so long as you have a Democratic majority here, but only for this time. [Laughter.]

What I wanted to call attention to is this—something which some one on that side ought to have called attention to, but did not—because the criticism of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was unjust. He criticized the Democratic campaign textbook, because it did not contain the Baltimore platform. How could they have put into that textbook any part of the Democratic platform when there is none left? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOORE. Does not the gentleman know that, in addition to leaving out the Panama Canal plank and the one-term plank for President, they also claim credit for the passage of the seamen's bill? I would like to know when that bill passed.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The Democratic campaign textbook is just as notable for what it leaves out as for what it puts in. Who would believe a Democratic platform promise, anyway? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOORE. Maybe the Filipinos.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, no. The Filipinos know how other people have been deceived, and instead of taunting them about not putting their platform into their textbook, you ought to compliment them on it. They are trying to forget it. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOORE. They used to tell it to the marines, but now they tell it to the Filipinos.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think I have sufficiently defended these distinguished gentlemen over there; they could not defend themselves. They are all tied to the President. I do not think it is fair for my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to taunt them when they are not in a position to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, may I not reply? A personal attack has been made upon me. I have been accused of defending the Democratic platform. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I must object to any further discussion out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, on page 16, line 16, to strike out the words "expenses now allowed by law" and insert the words "the sum now allowed in lieu of mileage."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 16, strike out the words "expenses now allowed by law" and insert in lieu thereof "the sum now allowed in lieu of mileage."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that he does not desire to strike out any more than the word "expenses," because "allowed by law" refers back to salary as well as mileage.

Mr. JONES. I think the gentleman is right about that; that was my first thought.

Mr. MILLER. It should read, "in addition to the salary the sum in lieu of mileage now allowed by law."

Mr. JONES. "The sum in lieu of mileage" should be inserted in place of the word "expenses." Mr. Chairman, I ask to modify my amendment so that we strike out the word "expenses" and insert "the sum in lieu of mileage."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 16, strike out the word "expenses" and insert the words "the sum in lieu of mileage," so that the amended lines will read: "Each of said Resident Commissioners shall, in addition to the salary and the sum in lieu of mileage now allowed by law, be allowed the same sum of stationery," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the amendment just reported by the Clerk be made. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The Democratic Party having done so little toward carrying out its platform pledges, they felt it incumbent on them to carry out one promise, and that is the Philippine promise. This is, I assume, on the theory that even if they do not keep faith with the American people they should keep faith with the Filipinos. I do not think, however, that justifies the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] in defending the writer of the Democratic campaign textbook in all he says. That gentleman charges the administration with being responsible for all the present——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Wyoming is not discussing his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I was proceeding to discuss the matter that was discussed a moment ago. If the gentleman on the other side will inform me what the last word is, I will discuss that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Wyoming, with all his keen intelligence, has not perception enough to know what the last word is, I shall not inform him. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the administration ought to be charged with all the crime and chaos in Mexico, and that is what their Democratic campaign textbook has charged the administration with.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order again that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the next thing in order is to return to the preamble in accordance with the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other part of the bill that was to be returned to?

Mr. JONES. Yes, Mr. Chairman; there is one other item.

Mr. MILLER. I was endeavoring to get recognition for the amendment that I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 19, line 4, by striking out after the word "law" the remainder of the sentence and inserting a colon and the following: "Provided, That whenever the Governor General shall exercise the authority granted in this section he shall at once notify the President of the United States thereof, together with the attending facts and circumstances, and the President shall have power to modify or vacate the action of the Governor General."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any objection on this side to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Now, Mr. Chairman, the next thing is to return to the preamble, as I understand the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the preamble.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the War with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement; and

Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein; and

Whereas for the speedy accomplishment of such purpose it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines as large a control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without, in the meantime, impairing the exercise of the rights of sovereignty by the people of the United States, in order that, by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers, they may be the better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence: Therefore——

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, before the amendment is reported I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia if we can not make some agreement as to the time for discussion of this preamble.

Mr. JONES. I should be very glad to come to some agreement. It is now 10 minutes of 3 o'clock. We want to vote on this bill this evening. I think that was the understanding on yesterday, when the business in order on Wednesday was made in order on Thursday, so that we might be able to complete this bill to-day. We have taken up so much time now in the discussion of amendments that there is not a great deal of time left. What would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. TOWNER. I should think we ought to have on this side one hour. This is the most important thing in the whole bill.

Mr. JONES. That is, two hours' discussion of the preamble and all amendments?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. That would bring it up to 10 minutes of 5. Then there is to be a half hour of general debate.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to waive that.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman will waive the 15 minutes allotted to his side?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; on the supposition, of course, that the gentleman will do the same in respect to his side.

Mr. JONES. But I had arranged with a gentleman on this side to occupy those 15 minutes, and, of course, I can not waive that.

Mr. TOWNER. Let the 15 minutes be considered as part of the hour.

Mr. JONES. That the 30 minutes are to be considered a part of the two hours?

Mr. TOWNER. Very well.

Mr. JONES. I do not object to that.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman submit the request, or shall I?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the preamble and all amendments thereto be limited to two hours, one half to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], and that the half hour of general debate which has been agreed to shall be included within the two hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on the preamble and amendments thereto be concluded in two hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], and that the half hour of general debate heretofore agreed upon shall be included in the two hours. Is there objection?

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some understanding about "where we are at" in this sort of a division. I understand that upon this side the chairman is opposed to any amendments to the preamble, and I do not understand what the position of the gentleman from Iowa is upon that side. I think the time ought to be divided equally in reference to the question at issue. I have no objection to limiting debate to two hours. I think that is longer than is necessary.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he would object to so modifying the request which I have made that of these two hours, one half to be taken from the hour controlled by him and the other half to be taken from the hour controlled by myself, the gentleman from Texas be allowed 10 minutes?

Mr. TOWNER. No; we are as much opposed to the gentleman's amendment as the gentleman is. We have already given up 15 minutes of our time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit the amendment to be reported, and then take up the question of this agreement for time? I have not heard the amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the preamble and inserting the following:

"That it is the purpose of the United States to cease exercising sovereignty over the Philippine Islands as soon as may be with justice to them and honor to the United States, and that it is the preference of the United States to accomplish this purpose by establishing an independent government in said islands; that in pursuance of such purpose and preference the President is respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of Great Britain Germany, France, Russia, Spain, and such other Governments as he may think advisable, with a view of effecting a joint treaty with such Governments, by which it shall be provided that an independent government in the Philippine Islands, when established by the United States, shall be recognized and preserved; that pending the establishment of such independent Philippine government the Philippine Islands shall be neutral territory; that such Philippine government, when established, shall agree that it will maintain equality of trade relations toward all the signatory powers, and that in the event of war between any of the nations of the earth it shall be neutral; that such concessions as may be made by the United States in the establishment of such independent government shall be recognized by all the signatory powers."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, first, that that exact proposition has been voted upon, and, second, that it is not germane to the preamble. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I would rather the gentleman would make the point of order now.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. BURGESS. Then we will have a brief discussion of it at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I am not much of a parliamentarian, but I take it that there are others here who are. I call attention to what Mr. Speaker CLARK said on October 2, 1914, in the discussion of this very matter. He then said:

If the gentleman will permit, of course I do not know the exact processes of the mind of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS], although I am remarkably well acquainted with him; but I take it that the reason he offered his resolution as section 1½ to this bill is that under parliamentary practice we do not get to the preamble until we get through with the bill. My own judgment about it is that as a parliamentary proposition it would come in as a substitute for the preamble; but it would be like locking the barn door after the horse is gone; and the gentleman has given notice that he proposes to strike out the preamble if his amendment goes in. So that it is practically offered as a substitute for the preamble.

I submit that in the absence of any authority or any pretense of any, that is the highest authority that we have in this House—the Speaker's own words. Further than that, to take a general and common-sense view of the situation, this resolution of mine which I have offered as an amendment to the preamble is so worded and framed as to come in line with the original preamble. The thing about it is that it goes further; that it does direct the President to enter into negotiations. That ought to be done. If it can be done in this way, what is the objection to it? I submit when I offered this as an amendment to the bill they made the point of order to that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. No point of order was made.

Mr. BURGESS. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. A point of order was made and it was overruled. Then, when it is offered to amend the preamble, it is said that there is no place for it in the bill. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill dealing with the Philippine question, and it deals broadly with it, and I think, although I am no parliamentarian and do not set myself up as such, it is clearly in order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I simply call the attention of the Chair, first, to the fact that the precise proposition which the gentleman now offers was offered as an amendment to the bill. The precise proposition in the precise language was voted down. It has therefore been disposed of, and the effort of the gentleman now is to get a vote upon that which has already been disposed of and settled. The second point of my parliamentary contention is that it is not germane to the preamble. A preamble, Mr. Chairman, is nothing but a recitation of facts or supposed facts. We do not put into a preamble a direction to anybody to do anything. See how this would read if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas were to prevail—to strike out the preamble and insert in lieu thereof the resolution which he has sent to the Clerk's desk, and before the enacting clause. It contains no recitation of facts——

Mr. BURGESS. The gentleman is mistaken about that; it begins by declaring the purpose of the United States.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. All right; I admit that. It does contain a specific direction to the President that he shall do a particular thing. Is it possible for any gentleman to conceive of putting into the preamble of a bill, or even a resolution, before the enacting clause, a proposition directing the President or anybody else to take a certain course? The preamble recites the facts. Directions must be contained in the enacting or resolving clause of the bill or resolution, as the case may be. With all possible respect, Mr. Chairman, if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas were to prevail and this preamble were to be stricken out and the resolution which he has sent to the desk be substituted in its place, it would leave this bill in the most peculiar shape grammatically, legislatively, and rhetorically that any bill was ever left in in the history of any legislative body in the world. Upon these two points I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas care to be heard further?

Mr. BURGESS. No; I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that, in view of the fact that this identical proposition has already been presented to the committee and been disposed of in the form in which it is now offered, it would not be proper to offer it as a substitute for the preamble. Furthermore, the Chair does not believe it is germane to the preamble, and for these reasons the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURGESS. The Chair will note that I take exception to the Chair's ruling.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I now renew my request.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the gentleman from Virginia what the status of amendments which some gentlemen may propose would be?

Mr. JONES. They would all have to be offered within the two hours.

Mr. MILLER. And then voted upon one after the other at the conclusion of general debate?

Mr. JONES. They would have to be voted upon during the two hours, I think. The request I made was that this preamble and all amendments that might be offered to it should be disposed of within two hours.

Mr. MILLER. Then, if I understand the gentleman, it is his intention that a Member who speaks in his time will offer such amendment or amendments as he desires, and at the conclusion of his remarks the amendment or amendments which he has offered will be voted upon.

Mr. JONES. That will be all right.

Mr. MILLER. I have no objection just so it is understood.

Mr. JONES. With the understanding, I have no objection; that they be voted upon at the conclusion of the debate.

Mr. MILLER. It is understood the time that may be occupied in voting upon an amendment will not be taken out of the two hours.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I do not presume much time will be occupied.

Mr. JONES. There will be two hours of general debate, and then the amendments will be voted on, but there will be no debate after the two hours.

Mr. MILLER. I understand.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Minnesota will understand that all debate, so to speak, must be embraced within the two hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the preamble close in two hours, one half of that time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], and at the end of that time the amendments offered shall be voted upon, and that the 30 minutes of general debate included in a former agreement shall be included in the two hours. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia if he thinks two hours, one hour to a side, is enough for the discussion of a subject of such tremendous importance as this?

Mr. JONES. It would not be if we had not already devoted 7½ hours to discussion of this subject. As I stated a few moments ago, we are very anxious to get through with this matter this evening, and probably there will be an aye and no vote in the House that will run way after 6 o'clock.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Virginia will remember that the issue was not made until the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] declared that he was opposed to the United States ever relinquishing control over the Philippine Islands, which injected a new issue, one unknown to the politics of this country, I think. I never heard of it being stated by one so prominent.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, the debate went on for several hours after that, and I really think two hours' debate on the preamble is a very liberal allowance of time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. Reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will permit, is it contemplated having a vote on the bill this evening?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. It is too late.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee (continuing). Do I understand the agreement was to close debate and then have the amendments voted on?

The CHAIRMAN. The agreement was to close all debate on the preamble and amendments thereto in two hours. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the hour on this side.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I am emphatically opposed to the preamble, to every paragraph of it, and to every line in it; but I assume that there may be a desire upon the part of the majority, who have the preponderance of votes in the committee, to maintain the preamble in the bill, and therefore I have three amendments which I desire to offer. The first amendment is to insert after the word "stable" in the second paragraph of the preamble the word "representative." The second amendment is to insert in the same line after the word "established" the two words "and maintained."

The third amendment which I desire to offer is as follows, to follow the second paragraph:

Provided, That the people of the Philippine Islands shall desire their independence, expressed by a majority vote of the qualified electors at the general election held next after it shall be decided that suitable government can be established.

Directing our attention first to the preamble as a whole, I think this is one of the most remarkable features of any bill that has ever been presented for the consideration of the Congress. It is to be noted, as has been stated many times before, that this is not a part of the bill. It is simply a gratuitous statement. It is not a promise; it is not an assurance. It simply says it has always been the intention of the people of the United States to give to the Philippine Islands independence. When? When a suitable government can be established therein. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a provision aimed for the welfare of the people of those islands, but a provision in the nature of playing party politics within the United States. In the Democratic platform language something like this is used—but no more futile language touching a great matter was ever employed—"as soon as a stable government can be established."

Mr. Chairman, to-day there is a stable government in the islands. Nay, more; there has been a stable government in the islands at least during the past 13 years. If, therefore, our guide is to be when a stable government can be established, the time for their independence is now, and any bill short of that is pure buncombe and an attempt to mislead and hoodwink rather than an attempt to carry out a policy.

But, Mr. Chairman, if it be contended that it means as soon as a stable government can be established by the Filipinos, we still have a matter that needs further elucidation. The Philippine people can establish a stable government to-day. It would not be a representative government; it would not be a republican form of government, as we understand it, but it would be a stable government. I believe that they could establish to-morrow a limited monarchy, and that government would be reasonably efficient and reasonably well maintained. It, therefore, it is the intention of the people of the United States to give to these people independence as soon as they can establish a government, that certainly comprehends a limited monarchy. But if it is the intention only to give them their independence when a representative government can be established and maintained by them, then let us write it in the bill. But above all, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we should consider the people of the islands. It seems to me that we should be guided by considerations of their wishes and their welfare rather than attempt to play party politics within the United States.

Do the people of the Philippine Islands to-day want immediate independence? No; they do not. Will they want it 10 years from now? I do not know and you do not know. I do not believe they will. But above all things we should give them the right to say whether they prefer to establish a government of their own by themselves or whether they prefer to remain beneath the American flag. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If it is the intent of Democracy to scuttle the ship, if it be the intent of Democracy to haul down the flag and withdraw our frontiers to our own shores, regardless of what may be the desire of that people or what may happen to them, then adopt the preamble. But if you are actuated by more humanitarian motives, if you have in your hearts altruistic designs, you will never adopt this preamble in its present form. I believe that in this bill and in this preamble there is an open confession of two things, namely, that the whole Democratic policy toward the Philippine Islands from 1900 until now has been wrong; that the whole policy of the Republican Party during that time has been right [applause on the Republican side]; that the Philippine people during that period of time at no moment have been capable of maintaining self-government and independence. Nay, more, that even after 14 years of the best instruction that a human soul ever had in government they are to-day still incapable of establishing and maintaining a government under independence. When will the time come? Nobody knows.

Therefore my second proposition is that this sounds the death knell of independence to the islands, at least during any period of time reasonable for us to consider. I am firmly of the opinion that the people of the Philippine Islands, having before their minds the historic events of the past 60 days, are trembling for fear you will haul down the American flag. Only on yesterday I received an account of an article in a native paper published in the islands that heretofore has been most extravagant in its requests for independence containing this remarkable confession:

> We now see after what has happened to Belgium, after what has happened to Luxemburg, after what we behold in various parts of the world, that the Philippine Islands need the United States now more than the United States needs the Philippine Islands.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

That sentiment is going to grow. I believe the political thought of the islands is bound to turn more and more away from independence to the industrial development of their resources.

While this bill and this preamble clearly indicate a new Democratic policy, one that in no sense contemplates independence of the islands for at least a great many years to come, yet in the passage of the preamble I can see a source of real trouble. To the Filipino mind the existence of this preamble will likely be taken to mean independence within a year or two, ever near at hand, and the scheming politician can easily foment agitation. As long as independence is not to be granted at any time possible now even to guess, it is the height of folly to place this preamble here.

It certainly is highly improper for a nation to say now what in the future it will do, especially in relation to its sovereignty. To do so is far from a statesmanlike course To do so is to create embarrassments and difficulties for the future. In years to come it may be preeminently desired, for a thousand reasons, both by the people of the islands and by the people of the United States, that the Philippine Archipelago remain a part of the United States. Why bind the future by unnecessary statements now? Why blindly declare the course of our conduct in the future without knowing what the future will bring forth? Will gentlemen insist at some future date to withdraw our sovereignty from the islands, even though the people of the islands beg and pray for it to remain? Are gentlemen so bent on partisanship that they are deaf alike to their Nation's honor and the call of humanity?

Mr. Chairman, the roll is soon to be called upon the passage of the bill. If this preamble be eliminated, I am inclined to vote for the measure, but if retained, I must oppose the whole.

While I say I would support the bill divested of the preamble, I do not wish it to be understood that I believe in all the features it contains. The best part of the bill—probably its largest part, as well—consists in its grant to the Filipinos of a complete legislature elected by them. I congratulate the framers of the measure for having adopted the one great recommendation I made, now almost a year ago, after my tour through the islands. I then said, as I have since many times repeated, that the Filipinos should have the full power to choose their own legislature, the full power to legislate for themselves, subject only to the check and restraint from an absolute veto. The absolute veto was at first criticized, but that principle has been made a part of the bill. I believe the people there will make reasonably wise use of this grant of legislative power, and, besides, its exercise will greatly train them in the business of government.

I am for the bill as a whole because it is up now for action, although I think its enactment now is premature. As long as the government in the islands is to be remodeled, let us do a good job of it—give to the Filipinos the fullest measure of power and see what use they make of it. Let them have a full and a fair chance to demonstrate what they can do. It would have been wise, in my opinion, if this complete reorganization of the government had been considerably postponed, but the intent is to reorganize now, and in the consideration of the bill I have sincerely tried to perfect it.

But let no one be deceived. In many ways this bill gives too suddenly power that should be acquired gradually. The enactment of this bill into law will inevitably decrease very materially the efficiency of the government in the islands. We have heard blind prejudice criticize and narrow partisanship malign the government hitherto maintained in the islands since they came beneath our flag, and yet the truth is, the truth a wiser world in the passage of time will recognize, is that in these far-away islands the Americans have established and maintained a better government than they have provided for themselves anywhere within the confines of the United States.

Under the provision extending the franchise, elections will likely present a sad and heartbreaking spectacle. But out of this slough the people will gradually climb. I hope they will rapidly overcome the election difficulties with which they will at first be embarrassed.

Then, too, the splendid work already well advanced among the non-Christian tribes will be materially halted. The method of handling the wild-tribe problem provided for in the bill will inevitably lead to many difficulties from which the wild man will surely suffer. A million of these people trustingly look to the United States as their great friend here on earth. I sincerely hope the Filipinos will measure up to the duty incumbent upon them, realize the responsibility now largely shifted to them, and by wise as well as generous conduct demonstrate that they are the brothers of these untutored savages.

I have great faith in the Filipino people. I want them to develop a distinct nationality and make their contribution to the advancement of human kind. The opportunity is before them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

[Mr. COOPER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further debate on this preamble——

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes' time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that amendments ought to be offered or be considered pending, because we have to vote on them as soon as this debate is concluded.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has offered his amendments.

Mr. MANN. No; he did not offer them.

Mr. JONES. I understood that he indicated that he would offer them.

Mr. MANN. That will be done right away.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in the opening of the debate, or rather at the close of the opening debate on this bill, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] referred to the fact that most of the discussion had been not on the bill but on the preamble. That was not extraordinary, as the gentleman should have realized, and possibly did.

Whether this declaration in the form of a preamble is the fruit of the settled conviction of a great party or is simply a piece of cheap political buncombe, in any event it is the thunder in the prelude that overshadows and colors all that follows. These people over yonder are not children. They can recognize a good thing in a political gift without having it sugar-coated by something that we may not be able to live up to and that they may never desire that we shall live up to.

Many of the provisions of this bill are good. I think that I should be willing to vote for all of its provisions if it were not for this misleading, unwise, unnecessary preamble. We are not in the Philippines and we never have been there for any purpose of exploitation. There is not a man under the flag that has ever had any other notion, no matter what party he belongs to, except that we have a great duty to perform over there.

I do not think the American people believe, or will believe, that duty can be performed by any policy of scuttle and surrender of our responsibilities. I look forward to the time when the Filipino people, having advanced in their knowledge of representative government, will realize how helpful it is to them, will realize how useful it is to them, aye, when they will take pride, as I think they now do, in the fact that they are politically united with the greatest Commonwealth of all time, as the eloquent representative of that people referred to the United States the other day.

Our relations with these people have been inspiring to us. They have been helpful to them. Never in history have any people advanced as these people have advanced with our aid and with our assistance and guidance. The future does not present to me any picture of our surrender of responsibility and the ultimate gobbling up of those islands by some oriental despotism. It presents to me an inspiring view of advancement, of enlightenment, of progress, under the guiding hand and strong protection of this great Republic, a view which in the days to come the people of the Philippine Islands will applaud as fully as our own people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Our acts and attitude toward these people must primarily be based on our opinion of what they desire and what is for their best interest. I would no more declare that it is our intention to hold the islands permanently than I would declare it is our intention to let them go. The future must decide that, and it will be decided in view of what those people may desire when the time arrives when they may be able to stand alone. For the present let us give them every particle of self-government they can wisely use and administer, and let the future decide what it is wise to do when the time for such a decision may arrive. Liberty and good government are what the people want. They can have it as well, and for the present at least better, united with us than as an independent government.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. HELM].

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, this preamble that has been so much criticized by gentlemen on the Republican side of the Chamber is the will and testament of the Democratic Party to the Philippine people.

Contrast the actions of the present Democratic Governor General, the policy of the Democratic Party as announced in the preamble, and the liberal provisions of this bill with the course pursued when the Republican Party was in power; when you, by inexcusable and unjustifiable war, subjugated these people, and now call it a blessing. As well should the Belgian people to-day return thanks and offer up their benedictions to the force, the overpowering force, that has desolated that country, as did the overpowering force of the United States subdue the Filipinos.

You made an unforgivable war on a people who had allied themselves with the American forces to drive out a people that were misgoverning these islands. You turned upon your allies and waged war upon them, and now take the position that you have conferred a blessing upon the people upon whom you have made an unpardonable war. The same subtle and promoting influences that were then at work reassert and disclose themselves here again when the leader of the Republican Party [Mr. MANN] but a few days ago said that we want to hold these islands on account of an inevitable war that he foresaw, and cited the fact that the colonies were coming to the assistance and aid of England; so would the Philippine Islands come to our rescue in time of like distress. Unwittingly he has raised the curtain and disclosed the real motive of the military party that was behind the McKinley administration which involved the United States in the Philippine Islands, and now insists on their retention.

Imperialism as against democracy! If we need these islands for war purpose, the argument of the gentleman from Illinois would say, "Give us other colonies for like uses and purposes as England has them." Imperialism in its worst form! Of what aid would England's colonies now be to her without her command of the sea? If we are going to embark in this war game and colonial policy, we need a Navy that will be as much greater than England as England and her allies now are to Germany; a standing Army stronger and more efficient than Germany's. How long will this Republic last after this warlike policy has been established? As between the two pictures, the Democratic Party presents this bill, working back as rapidly and as safely as it can to give these people the management and control of their own affairs, and in due season their independence.

This is the first time that a government that has by conquest acquired sovereignty over the territory of another nation or race of people declares by its official and only mouthpiece that it proposes to voluntarily surrender that sovereignty over the country that it had acquired by conquest. Search the annals of history and where will you find a nation or country that has acquired another territory, described, as are the Philippine Islands, as of boundless resources, of wonderful fertility—where can you show me a like instance that that Government has freely and voluntarily given back to the people the control of the government and the sovereignty that it took away by force? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I listened with some degree of emotion to the distinguished gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. HELM]. He calls this declaration in the preamble the Democratic will and testament to the Philippines. I was aware of the fact that the Democratic Party was sick, but I did not know that it had reached that stage where it thought it was necessary to make its will. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

But it soon would be dead if the people of this country believed that the Democratic Party stood for the doctrine that was preached by the gentleman from Kentucky who has just taken his seat. In my judgment, that was a speech more to be condemned than any that I have heard made upon this question. When he rails against his own country for going into the Philippines, he is welcome to any credit that he can bring to himself or the Democratic Party. Such harangues will find no response from the American people.

My objection to this preamble is largely because of the fact that it does not state any position on account of its duplicity. It is drawn so as to make the Filipinos believe that we want to give them independence, and to make the American people believe that we do not. That part of the preamble in which it says—

> Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein—

I take issue with as to the fact.

What party declared for it except the Democratic Party, and when did the Democratic Party and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] become a majority of the people of the United States, or have a right to speak for a majority on questions of that character? The Republican Party never so declared, and the Progressive Party never so declared, and that other platform that was drawn at Chicago by the Roosevelt forces when they thought he was going to be nominated had this declaration in regard to the Philippines:

> We pledge the Republican Party to complete the work of preparing the Philippine Islands for self-government under the American flag.

No party except the Democratic Party has ever declared for independence. No party except the Democratic Party, and no man, so far as I know, except the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HELM], has ever thought that the Stars and Stripes brought an injury to any country. Only once before in the history of this Nation did we ever haul down the flag, and we have been ashamed of it ever since, and we should be. That act, under a former administration, a Democratic one, of course, forever discredited us in the eyes of the world.

I do not believe the Filipinos wish independence. Those who think they will govern do; those that will be governed do not. I believe that when the Filipinos are sufficiently intelligent to govern themselves they will be sufficiently intelligent to appreciate the advantages of remaining under our flag. Wherever the Stars and Stripes have gone they have brought good, and they will bring only good to the Philippine Islands. For one, I am opposed to the cowardly proposition to turn these islands loose, to become a prey of the other nations of the world. Such act would cause us forever to be despised by all right-thinking men. To give them independence and then agree to protect them from their own folly and the strong nations of the world would be dangerous to us and ruinous to them. If the time ever comes when we grant independence to the Philippines, then let it be complete and unconditional. We did not go in there of our own volition, but we would be untrue to our trust and untrue to civilization and untrue to ourselves to turn those islands loose under any conditions whatsoever. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that we should not think of granting independence to the Philippines at this time, and I do not believe the time will ever come when we could. I agree with him that our highest duty is to give them fullest liberty and make them our friends. Talk of independence now can only do harm and hold out hope to the Filipino people that will not be realized. The Democratic Party will talk independence for political purposes, but they will never vote it for the same reason. It is perfectly safe for the Democratic Party to promise that they will grant independence when "a stable government is established." Behind that phrase the Democratic Party can dodge and hide as long as they will. Such promise is nothing but a delusion and a snare to the Filipino people. Such promise is intended to mislead the people of the Philippines. The youngest of those now in the islands will not live to see the fulfillment of that Democratic promise, nor any real attempt to fulfill it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, several years ago, in reading the debates in Congress, I observed the statement of one of those who spoke for the policy of benevolent assimilation in the Senate, and I well remember his words. He said there were mountains of gold in the Philippines, and that they were ours forever! I am glad that I have an opportunity to participate in erasing the stain of that declaration from this Nation.

Mr. Chairman, they tell us that we are holding the Philippines for their own good and not ours. This plea of benevolence for others is a subterfuge as old as history. Every man who has enslaved another man has enslaved him under the claim that it was for the benefit of the slave. Every nation that has conquered and subjugated a defenseless people has conquered them under the claim that it was for the benefit of the subjugated. Every burden and iniquity that has been heaped upon the weak by the strong has been under the claim that it was for the benefit of the weak. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And the claim made here is only a repetition in history, when they tell us now that the Filipinos do not desire independence. It is only following in line with a policy of justification as old as the rule of force and might, and it has ever been thus. The slaves have never desired their liberty if we are to take the word of the slaveholder. The conquered have never desired their freedom if we are to take the word of the conqueror. They have always asked for their own slavery and subjugation and a continuance of their thralldom and their captive state. Such has ever been the claim of the disciples of benevolent assimilation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is a matter of history that when we acquired the Philippine Islands the life of Washington and the history of the American Revolution were found scattered broadcast over those islands. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Following in our example, they, too, were dreaming of liberty and independence, but, alas, only to awake in the grasp of a phantom they were following for deliverance. I believe that liberty and self-government can be better taught by example than by conquest and subjugation; that men will follow with glad hearts where they will resent force and coercion. The mission of this Government is not conquest and subjugation. It is to preserve the principles of self-government at home and promote popular rule abroad. That is our mission, and it is a great and glorious mission.

Mr. Chairman, it is true that some men are wiser than other men; it is true that some men are more intelligent than other men; it is true that some men have a greater fund of information in store than other men; but no man is so much wiser, or so much more intelligent, or in possession of so much greater store of information than other men, that he is entitled to tell another man what that other man likes, or what is good for him, or how he should live or love or worship, or to govern him against his will and consent.

The eloquent pleas, the brilliant advocacy, and the tireless activity of the Commissioner from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON] for the independence of those islands is a full, complete denial, a conclusive rejection and disproval of this subterfuge and transparent apology for holding these people against their will and consent on the ground that they are incapable of self-government and are not asking for a government of their own.

But our retention of these islands is not only in violation of inalienable human rights and in disregard of the fundamental principles of our institutions, but it is and will be a continuing drain upon our Treasury, a menace to our peace among the nations, and a jeopardy to our security and very national existence. In case of war, these far-away islands in the Tropics, 10,000 miles across the sea, could only be defended, if defense was possible, at an appalling cost in treasure and an awful sacrifice of the lives of our citizens.

And if it was justifiable for us to withhold liberty from these people on the ground of their own well-being, we are precluded from such denial to them by our solemn vows before the world in matters of human rights and by deeds of our forefathers, who consecrated their lives to the principle that all just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed. We are precluded by our declaration of the rights of men, which we read in the indelible hues of the Stars and Stripes waving from every flagstaff on land and unfolding from every masthead on the sea, in the great Dome of this Capitol, lifting the symbol of our devotion heavenward, in the Mounment to Washington, standing out in its dizzy heights against the sky, and in the hearts of 90,000,000 of people, throbbing with the pride and honor of their own freedom and independence before the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, during this Congress I have taken great pleasure in voting on pretty nearly all of the great administration measures with the President of the United States, and I am glad I did so; and if I had the whole thing to do over again, I would vote the same way. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But I would not vote for this preamble to this Philippine bill. I would prefer to change my vote on any measure that I have voted on in this Congress than to vote favorably on this Philippine preamble. I think it is wrong in principle. I believe that it is violative of the very purposes that the Government should have in mind in developing its policy in the Pacific Ocean. Aside from the fact that it will disturb conditions over there and make those people uncertain, if it were binding upon us, it would commit us to a policy that is likely to be destructive of ourselves and of our own rights. Why was it that we took the Philippine Islands? The gentleman just spoke of history and what history said about it. I suppose you will accept Woodrow Wilson as a good authority on history, and you will accept his chronicles as those of an impartial historian. Here is what he said was the reason why President McKinley favored the taking of the Philippine Islands and why they were taken; I quote from his book on Epochs of American History, page 344:

> One of the principal reasons that President McKinley had in mind for demanding the Philippines was furnished by the fact that at this time the Empire of China seemed to be tottering to its fall and that the powers of Europe were even then parceling out the prospective spoils. We already had considerable trade interests with the Orient, and the President was persuaded that these might be largely increased if we could but acquire a vestibule thereto somewhat similar to that which England had had at Hongkong for years or that which Germany had just acquired at Kiaochow. But the Philippines once acquired, the very example which had suggested their acquisition seemed now of dangerous import for American interests For if, in addition to obtaining naval stations and ports of entry to the Chinese Empire, the powers of Europe should proceed to partition its whole vast area and population among themselves, the next step would naturally be the exclusion by each of all others from its respective allotment, and the upshot of the matter would be that the United States would find itself possessed of the Philippines, indeed, but, so far as Chinese trade was concerned, more entirely out in the cold than ever. In brief, the acquisition of the Philippines carried with it as a corollary American championship of the integrity of China and of the "open door" to Chinese trade.

The taking of the islands was popular. The American people backed it up, and, as all will remember, when the treaty came up for approval and it took two-thirds in the United States Senate to approve it, and they lacked two or three votes, Mr. William Jennings Bryan came across the country as the representative of Democracy at the time and urged the adoption of the treaty, and the treaty was adopted.

Mr. Chairman, there is a race issue in the Pacific Ocean beside which the race issue of the South pales into insignificance. The Japanese possess intelligence, they possess ingenuity, they possess ability in all lines that the Negro race never dreamed of and never will dream of if this world lasts for a million years. I want us to live at peace with Japan, and I believe we can do that very thing if we follow the chart that nature and destiny has marked out for us and refuse to falter and waver. If we let the world know that we have a policy and that we will live up to it, there will be no trouble. But those people on the Pacific Ocean are confronting us, they are confronting the white race on the Pacific Ocean, and we are compelled to maintain that we have the right to restrict their immigration into our country. We claim that we have the right to limit or exclude them, and at the same time we have the right to the trade of the Orient——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRYAN. Make it short; I have only five minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If we have the right to keep them from coming into this country, then have not they the equal moral right to keep us from going into their country?

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman believes that he would not be taken as a patriot on the Pacific coast. He would not be recognized as a patriot on the Pacific coast if he takes the position that we have not the right to shut the yellow race out from our country any more than they have the right to shut out our trade and ships of commerce. We let them come here to trade, but we can not attempt to amalgamate with them.

Harper's Weekly of June, 1913, tells in a dramatic way of a short speech of a farmer member of the California Legislature that silenced all opposition to the alien land bill and insured its passage despite the protests and the pleas of the President and the Secretary of State.

My neighbor is a Jap—

Said the farmer member—

and he has an 80-acre fruit farm next to mine. He is smart and industrious, and I do not dislike him. He has a white woman living in his house. On that white woman's knee is a baby. Now, what is that baby? Is it white? Is it Japanese? I will tell you what it is. It is the beginning of the biggest race problem that the world has ever known.

The bureau of vital statistics of Sacramento, Col., in the year ending May, 1913, recorded 276 births of all nationalities. Of these 107 were Japanese, and half of that number were born of white mothers and Japanese fathers.

Lucile F. Dawson, who has resided in Japan for some years and made a close study of Japanese and oriental problems, writing for the Square Deal for October, has this to say:

In Tokyo, Yokohama, and Nagasaki, where the largest number of English-speaking people reside, there have been several of these international marriages, and in almost every instance the children of such unions have been degenerates. A Japanese teacher in an American school at Nagasaki is authority for this statement. She further said that upon investigation as to the cause of this degeneracy they found in every case both parents to be of the better class of Japanese and Occidental. Few of the European or American men intermarry with the Japanese women, but a great many white women marry Japanese men of the noble and Heimen classes. This latter class is between the classes we have in the United States and the nobility and are just as exclusive as the latter. It was this class whose courage, valor, and devotion to Japan were so admirably displayed during the Chinese and Russian wars. Yet, with some of the best blood of the Anglo-Saxon race and the healthiest and best of Japanese blood in their veins, American school statistics in Japan show these children to be not only backward but physically degenerate.

Another reason why the Japanese are so desirous of intermarrying with the better class of Caucasians is because of the physical inferiority of the Japanese people. Centuries of isolation, the exclusive use of vegetable food, climatic conditions, and intermarriage have had the effect of bringing about a lack of physical vigor and a race of small-statured people, a well-defined difference which characterizes the Anglo-Saxon, Celtic, and Teutonic races, a difference the ambitious Japanese is keenly cognizant of. And they are just as ambitious to remove this badge of inferiority from their race as they are to excel in warrior prowess.

Except England, there is no nation as aristocratic as Japan. From its first era there has been great distinction between the noble and ignoble classes, a condition which occidental influences have been unable to entirely eradicate, and which is as strong in the heart of the Yeta as it is in the heart of the great nobles. All classes point with pride to the fact that Japan is the only nation where the reigning imperial family has descended from time immemorial to the present, in one unbroken line of succession, the present Emperor being the one hundred and twenty-second of the imperial line.

They will tell you with pride what great statesmen they are and that as yet they have never been conquered by any other nation and, furthermore, they never will be. As we are the youngest nation in the world they will explain how impossible it is for Americans to be their superior, and how inferior our form of government is to theirs. The very lowest caste Japanese considers himself the superior of any American, and American customs, religions, and ideas of morality are far inferior to those of Japan, according to the Japanese lights.

It is to be hoped that we will never have war with Japan or China or with any other power concerning our Pacific interests. But our possessions in the Pacific exclusive of the Philippines have forced upon us certain obligations to which we must be faithful. The climax of our entire scheme in the Pacific is the open door in China. We stand for the territorial integrity of China and for the absolute freedom of all nations to trade in China on an equal basis. This policy is so fair and reasonable that we have been able to enforce it heretofore through diplomacy. Every step of history seems to accord with this policy. England is compelled to favor it, and it seems now that Germany is to be converted to it, and very likely Germany, after the termination of the present war, will be one of the strongest supporters of the policy. Japan may chafe some under the enforcement of the open door at times, but it almost seems that is with us in the enforcement of the open door in China. The Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, and the Dominion of Canada stand as controlling factors so far as the policy of England is concerned. These dependencies of England, which are practically free and independent Governments, will always support us in this open-door policy and in the maintenance of Caucasian authority in the Pacific. The instant that proposition is challenged by Japan, that instant the alliance between England and Japan must fall, or Canada, Australia, and New Zealand will turn against their mother country and stand with us. It seems that the God of Nations has willed it this way, has carved out this destiny for us, and put us in a position where we can stand for the highest ideals of altruism in our dealings with China and Japan and the Philippines, and yet can work out our own destiny and aid in fulfilling the most worthy and the sincerest ambitions and longings of the race, as well as promote stability and insure peace.

We are a peace-loving people. We do not care to emigrate to Japan or China, either, if they do not want us there. We do not want to own land in Japan. We do not want to crowd Japanese schools with American children and young men. We do not shut our doors to Japanese trade. We have a good friend in China, and our position as to the open-door policy and the preservation of the integrity of China insures a lasting friendship. By maintaining our position in the Philippines we can meet the falsehoods that may be circulated; we can demonstrate our American character to the orientals. I think it an awful mistake to throw hindrances in the way by lauding the Aguinaldos as the George Washingtons of the islands, by encouraging insurrection and discontent by titles to acts and by silly and vain preambles. Such procedure is little short of shameful.

JEALOUS NATIONS TRIED TO ELIMINATE US.

It has been said that we acquired the Philippines and paid $20,000,000 for them because Germany was negotiating with Spain for them. I do not know whether that is true or not, but if it was true, I think it was sufficient reason for us to close the bargain and not allow Germany to get that foothold in the Pacific under conditions that then existed. I am very much inclined to give credence to the report. Here is a statement that has an indirect bearing on the subject, made by Woodrow Wilson in Epochs of American History, page 344. After writing of European jealousies against us in the Spanish-American War, the author says:

It failed, but the jealousy that underlay it found expression now and then in more petty ways. In Manila Bay, for example, Admiral Diedrichs, of the German squadron, which had been dispatched thither after Dewey's victory for no adequate reason at all, became so officious that Dewey offered him "a fight if he wanted it," with the result of bringing such annoyances to an end.

Mr. Chairman, every man worthy of a seat in this House has his own individual views on the great economic, moral, and industrial questions of the day. I was brought up in the State of Louisiana and was taught Democracy as one of the fundamentals; yet as I came to manhood and paid closer attention to political arguments and party pretensions I observed that Democracy in Louisiana involved mainly a race issue and pride of southern history. I was not wanting in loyalty on either of these scores. But I also observed that on the great economic questions on which the parties differed the leading Louisiana Democrats were just as much Republican as they were Democrat. They were protectionists in so far as the tariff involved the customs rates on sugar, lumber, and rice. No Payne or Aldrich could put too much tariff on either of these products to suit these Louisiana Democrats. On labor issues, on money legislation, the Louisiana Senators and Members of Congress in that long-ago day were as standpat as Wall Street or the "infant industries" would have them.

After three years of Theodore Roosevelt as President I emigrated to the State of Washington. On the "paramount issue" of imperialism I had been dubbed Republican by one of my best friends, who is now one of the leaders of the party in the State of Louisiana, and when I landed on Puget Sound I was easily enthused on the destiny of America in the Pacific and the Orient. I gloried in the plans for extension of American influence in the Far East. Parker was running against Roosevelt, and the Democrats were holding their noses and voting for Parker. I at once became a Roosevelt supporter.

One of the main features that controlled my views at that time was the straightforward plans of Theodore Roosevelt and his advisers to take care of American interests and the interests of the Caucasian race in the Pacific. I had been brought up with a race issue dinning in my ears, and so I readily adapted my views to this new race issue. I believed in the expansion of trade and the extension of influence in the Pacific. The people of the country voted against a retreat from our position in the Pacific, and the people to-day are of the same opinion. Nobody knows any better than the Democratic leaders that the people of this country do not want this Nation committed to a policy of retreat and backdown in the Pacific, and so they come here in the face of the Democratic platform and are expecting to force through this House as a lame compliance with a platform pledge this title and preamble to their Philippine bill, which will be no part of the bill and will have no separate existence and will therefore be nothing.

The bill starts out with a falsehood and an attempt at deception when it is presented to Congress and to all who may read it hereafter with these words of introduction which compose its title:

A bill to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

Yet there is not in the bill one word declaratory of "the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands."

If there were any doubt as to this proposition, the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], of the Committee on Insular Affairs, who has been aiding the chairman of that committee in presenting this bill, would clear all doubts. On October 2 the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] offered an amendment to be incorporated in the act as a new section, attempting to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the islands, so as to take from the title of the act its falsehood and deceit by making it speak the truth. There was no question about the Democratic orthodoxy of the proposed amendment. The gentleman from Texas offered the following letter, written last January, on that point:

JANUARY 28, 1914.

MY DEAR BURGESS: I remember well your speech on the Philippine resolution in January, 1906, and was very favorably impressed then, and subsequent study has brought the fixed conviction that your resolution is the solution of the problem. It ought to be passed, as it not only accords with the last Democratic platform, but is based on the soundest and wisest principles.

Your friend, CHAMP CLARK.

But hear the distinguished Tennesseean [Mr. GARRETT]:

Mr. Chairman, I am well aware of the great thought which my friend from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] has given to this question. The amendment which he offers is an exact copy of a resolution introduced by him in 1904 originally and which has been reintroduced at each succeeding Congress and has been before the Committee on Insular Affairs ever since I have been a member of the committee. I am in a large measure in sympathy with part of the sentiment of the resolution; but I respectfully submit to the membership of the House that it has no place at this point or at any other point in this bill.

Speaker CLARK has a trait, rather unusual in some quarters, of standing up for and defending what he believes in, so he asked the gentleman from Tennessee this question:

Why is not this Burgess resolution just as pertinent to this bill as the preamble which is on it now?

To which question the gentleman from Tennessee replied:

Mr. Chairman, if it were in proper form offered as an amendment to the preamble, I would not undertake to say that it was not pertinent to that, although it contains a direction, while the preamble only contains a recitation; but it is offered as an independent section, section 1½, to the legislative part of the bill. You do not want to say by an enactment of law that it is the preference of the United States to do so and so.

Yet the title declares just precisely the opposite:

THE TITLE OF THE ACT.

A bill to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the Philippine Islands and——

MR. GARRETT OF TENNESSEE.

You do not want to say by an enactment of law that it is the preference of the United States to do so and so.

Of course, nearly every Member of this House agrees with the gentleman from Tennessee, that we ought not to put into this bill such an enactment, yet when the motion is made, as it will be, to amend the title by striking out of it that portion which contains the false statement that the bill is to "declare the purpose of the United States to do so and so," the committee will oppose the amendment. They want that false pretense in the title and want to vaguely incorporate it in a series of whereases, entirely outside of and not a part of the bill. If it is not a part of the bill and is not fit for enactment in the bill, why put it in the title? And why oppose amending the title so as to make it obey that commandment which reads after this fashion, "Thou shalt not pattern the words of thy mouth after the words of Ananias"?

In the effort of this committee to placate and please the followers of Aguinaldo and a number of good men in the Philippines, who are ambitious to establish a petty kingdom or a republic in the Far East and to fool themselves and the people of the United States into believing that they are keeping their platform pledge, they put this "recitation," as the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee calls it, in the title and before the enacting clause of this bill. If they were to put it where it would have to be signed by the President, the Secretary of the Navy would beg, the Secretary of War would plead, and the Secretary of Commerce would urge, and the President would say to the members of the Cabinet, "Do you suppose I would be silly enough to sign such an enactment as that?"

It would be the very acme of absurdity to make such a declaration. If when I first went to the State of Washington I felt deeply on this subject, that feeling has been intensified by residence on the Pacific coast.

There is plenty of room on the Pacific for the yellow race and the white race, but we are sure to have trouble if we dilly-dally and fail to let our purpose be known. I would not deprive Japan of any credit due her for her marvelous development. We want to keep her friendship and we want to adopt a fair and friendly course with Japan. But we must have a fleet in the Pacific to guarantee the open door in China and to protect American interests.

Is the open-door policy less important now? Are the interests of the Caucasian race less important at this juncture? Is our duty to maintain an equilibrium in the Far East and to preserve peace any less pronounced now?

Are we a nation of quitters? Are we going to flee for our lives? When we get out of the Philippines, are we going to get out of the other islands and out of Alaska? The whole propaganda is absurd. I do not blame the Democrats for keeping such a disgraceful policy out from under the enacting clause of any bill, leaving it where it is vain and void; but the manly, decent thing to do would be to stand firm for American sovereignty in the Philippines, for the open door in China, and for the white man on the Pacific.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from the Philippine Islands [Mr. QUEZON].

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, it would be foolish, were it not so pathetic, to say, as does the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], who preceded me on the floor, that the Filipino people do not want independence to-day and that they would not even desire it in the future when they really become capable of self-government. That, however, is not a new statement. It has been heard before now in every country and it has been availed of by every tyrant. No ruler can ever be made by any evidence to believe that his subjects want to be free from his yoke. The speech of the gentleman from Washington has been delivered before in more or less the same words before the House of Commons in England, the difference being that his people, not mine, were at that time struggling to be independent, while the British lawmakers were there asserting that those people did not want independence. The American colonies were then said to be, as the Filipino people are now said to be, led astray by unscrupulous, selfish politicians, who were wont to exploit and enslave their own people. Why, Mr. Chairman, how any man can say that the Filipino people, having defied, because they wanted to be independent, the greatest and most powerful Republic upon this earth, knowing when they did so that they would unavoidably be crushed in that unequal struggle, do not now want to be free is beyond my comprehension.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman two minutes additional.

Mr. QUEZON. Is the committee unaware that thousands upon thousands of men drawn from all walks of life died in that destructive war while their wives, daughters, mothers, and sisters continued to urge the survivors to persevere until the whole nation was very nearly annihilated? Does the gentleman from Washington believe that that war was a joke, and that we went into it as a matter of amusement? How can he say that Filipinos will not want independence when they are capable of self-government? What an amazing theory, and yet it seems to be believed in and proclaimed by many statesmen as almost self-evidently true. If people do not want independence when they become capable of self-government, it must follow that no independent nation is capable of self-government. Indeed, I am almost inclined to accept that idea, and so to accept the view of the gentleman from Washington, when I see some of the most enlightened nations engaged in war, each killing the citizens of the other by scores of thousands, and each destroying wealth belonging to the others, thereby inflicting upon humankind more injury during a few months of their gigantic struggle than all the harm and destruction that the so-called incapable countries, with their petty revolutions, could cause in a century. But, Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the committee in the closing hour of this debate by entering upon discussions of this sort. The arguments which proceed from such premises as those I have cited are outworn, obsolete, and completely out of date. Every boy in school knows how to answer them. I shall, in discussing the preamble of this bill, address myself exclusively to the views expressed by the distinguished leader of the minority, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois takes the position that the preamble of this bill should be voted down, and that the legislative provisions of this bill should be amended so as to give the people of the Philippine Islands a government still more autonomous than is provided for in the bill. The gentleman's opposition to the preamble is placed squarely on the ground that the United States should forever retain the Philippine Islands, because such retention will provide this country with an important resource in a supposedly forthcoming struggle—commercial and perhaps military and naval—between the East and the West, while such retention would also prove beneficial to the Filipino people themselves. The gentleman is convinced that with the granting of such an autonomous government as he suggests the Filipino people will grow more friendly to the United States and will be content to remain under American control.

Mr. Chairman, opposition to the preamble based upon the considerations stated by the gentleman from Illinois is worthy of serious attention and deserves to be met on its own ground. Let me say, before I reply to the gentleman from Illinois, that I have been particularly pleased with his remarks. His views and mine are, of course, widely and completely apart; but I give him credit, and I feel under obligation to him for not following the old line of insincere argumentation that has heretofore caused such shame and anger in the minds of the Filipino people, and that starts with the assumption that we are wholly incapable of governing ourselves or that we are an unpatriotic people, whose favored classes are eagerly watching for and taking advantage of every opportunity to abuse, mistreat, and exploit our fellow citizens, so that we must be ruled by more intelligent and more public-spirited foreigners. I am grateful to the gentleman from Illinois for his candor and openness, and I am sure my people join me in the sentiment. I know that his remarks will not be indorsed by a single Filipino; but, on the other hand, they will certainly not be resented by my countrymen. It was a businesslike presentation, composed of great thoughts elegantly clothed with apt expressions—this speech of the gentleman from Illinois. Yet I fear that the basic premise of his position is false, and that therefore the whole structure of his Philippine policy must fail to endure the test of time and of past experience.

I have noticed, Mr. Chairman, that, comprehensive as the speech of the gentleman from Illinois was, he failed to discuss—indeed, he apparently never gave a thought to—the one question which must be answered before his views can be accepted by analytical minds. That question is this: What would the United States do should the Filipino people, after they have been granted autonomy—complete domestic autonomy, if you please—still demand independence? Would the United States still insist, in such a case, upon keeping the islands, against the will of their inhabitants, under the sovereignty of this Nation? Would the United States, if necessary, resort to force to compel the Filipino people, under those circumstances, to continue subject to the American flag? Would the retention of the Philippines under such circumstances be an aid to the United States in such a forthcoming struggle as is predicted by the gentleman? The gentleman from Illinois did not deem it necessary to ask himself this question, because he took it for granted, as he stated it on this floor, that after you have given the people of the Philippine Islands complete autonomy, larger and greater autonomy than this bill confers, as he would gladly have you do, the Filipino people would become your good friends and would therefore no longer desire independence.

Mr. Chairman, I do not doubt, in fact I am sure, that the Filipino people will become your friends, your very good friends, after this bill is enacted. They would, however, be still more friendly to you if a measure providing for more autonomy, such as the gentleman from Illinois has suggested, should be passed. But I fear that the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken when he thinks that the Filipino people after the enactment of such a bill would prefer to remain forever a self-governing colony of this country. The gentleman seems to forget that the enjoyment of liberty makes people crave for more liberty still, and that the progress of nations toward freedom when once the first step has been taken does not cease until complete sovereignty has been attained. I do not pretend to be a prophet or even a statesman, and I shall not ask that my prediction—which after all is but a prediction that, like others, may prove to be mistaken—I shall not ask that my prediction be given more weight than the prediction to the contrary which has been offered by the gentleman from Illinois. Of one thing, however, I am sure, as sure as I am that I am alive and standing upon this floor now. That is, that if the Filipino people should ever surrender their ardent desire to be free from the United States, it would not be after the enactment of the bill that the gentleman from Illinois proposes and the defeat of the preamble of this bill as he suggests. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois makes the realization of his hope an impossibility when he asks that the preamble of this bill be voted down—that preamble which confirms through a congressional declaration the promises heretofore made by the Executives of this Nation and by other representative American statesmen. If you defeat this preamble, in spite of the existence of such an autonomous government as you may confer upon the Filipino people, you will not make them your friends. If you defeat this preamble you will thereby at once lose the confidence of the people of the Philippines, and perhaps even their respect. Friendship and respect can only exist among nations as among men when the conduct of those who have entered into relations with one another is free from all suggestion of bad faith. The breaking of a promise, the disregard of past pledges, is a sure cause of distrust and of disrespect.

Mr. Chairman, again and again the people of the Philippine Islands since the first American commander landed at the city of Manila have been told by the representatives of this Government in those islands that the United States was in the Philippines for the sole purpose of helping the Filipinos to establish the foundations of their independent national life. Those promises have been reiterated by the Chief Executives of this Nation in their messages both to the Filipino people and to the American Congress. Mr. Taft, Mr. Roosevelt, and Mr. Wilson in official documents that are recorded in the archives of this Government have each and all made such declarations. The Filipino people have taken the words of those officials at face value, regarding them as the words of the American people themselves, whom the Presidents I have enumerated represented when they made these declarations. To-day the American Congress is asked not to ratify but to repudiate those words and those declarations. And on what ground? On the ground that you need the aid of the Philippines that you may emerge victorious from a supposedly forthcoming conflict—commercial or armed—for the control of the Pacific. What effect, Mr. Chairman, would the action of this Congress exert upon the Filipinos should the advice of the gentleman from Illinois be heeded? The Filipino people would at once take the defeat of the preamble of the bill as a convincing proof that this Nation would repudiate the promises it early made whenever it might be to her interest to do so. After such a repudiation had occurred, how could any man ever expect the Filipino people again to have confidence in the American Nation? What would be the advantage to be gained by the enactment of a law establishing an autonomous government in the Philippine Islands if the Filipino people could not feel secure in the free and everlasting enjoyment of that autonomy, or if they must forever fear that, inasmuch as you repudiated your promise of independence made when you did not think the Philippines a commercial or strategic asset but changed your opinion on this subject when conditions made it convenient, you might in like manner establish another kind of government whenever you thought it best for your purposes to do so? Ah, Mr. Chairman, without confidence, without faith, always fearful of what might happen in the future, how could anyone expect the Filipino people to be contented and thus ask it to remain under the American flag?

There is another consideration so obvious that I note with surprise that so learned a student of human nature as is the gentleman from Illinois could have forgotten or overlooked it. Does the gentleman forget that the one fact whose invariable truth has been repeatedly demonstrated since God created the first man is that human kind always prefers forbidden fruit? So long as you tell the people of the Philippines that they can never be independent, so long will you be adding fuel to their already burning desire to be independent.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps the gentleman from Illinois, with his farsightedness, with his statesmanship, with his ability to look clearly into the dim and cloudy days of the far-distant future—qualities that fortune has not given me—is right in his expectations and his hope that the day will some time come when the Filipino people, after having been granted control of their domestic affairs and after having thus lived for so many years under the American flag—that would then mean to them the sovereignty of a strong and friendly nation, not the despotic rule of a tyrant master—may prefer to be permanently a self-governing colony of this empire rather than a free and independent republic born by this mother of republics. But should that ever happen, it would be only after the preamble of this bill had received congressional approbation; only after the Filipino people had been told by the American people through its constitutional representative—the Congress—that they may if they so desire be some day an independent and sovereign nation. Then, and only then, the Filipino people, reassured as to your good faith, convinced that whatever you may pledge yourself to do is assured of fulfillment when once the pledge is given, no matter whether your selfish interests do or do not dictate otherwise—then, and only then, may the Filipino people of their own free will and spontaneous volition decide that they prefer to maintain a permanent political relationship with the United States. And then, and only then, can that relationship be beneficial to both peoples, a real protection to the Philippines and a source of strength to the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] cited the present relations between Canada and Great Britain as an illustration of what would surely come to pass were the Philippines to be granted full autonomy in the administration of their domestic affairs and were this preamble to be defeated. He called the attention of the committee to the spectacle offered by that self-governing colony in hastening to the aid of her mother country in the great war now raging in Europe.

In the first place, I can tell the gentleman that it is too premature to assert now that the political ties between Canada and Great Britain will never be severed. Who is wise enough to predict that when Canada shall have increased sufficiently in population and wealth she will still prefer to be a colony rather than a sovereign nation? But whatever may be the permanence or the character of the relations between England and Canada, they would offer no evidence as to what will be the course of future relations between the United States and the Philippines. Two very essential circumstances in the relationship between England and Canada are absent in the case of the United States and the Philippines. In the former case there exists a community of race and of origin. Second, and perhaps more important still, England has never felt called upon to violate the pledge of her Government or any of her premiers in order to proceed with her colonial policy toward Canada. No promise of independence was ever made to the Canadian people, and therefore the element of international distrust has never disturbed the mind of the Canadian people. The present connection of Canada with England has been the natural outgrowth of a political tie whose severing never was thought of or announced.

Mr. Chairman, that is all I intend to say in connection with the speech of the gentleman from Illinois. I believe I have demonstrated for his benefit and for that of those who think with him that the only way to accomplish their purpose, if it could ever be accomplished, is by voting for this preamble and trusting to the future the development and determination of the final relationship between the United States and the Philippines. The retention of this preamble does not necessarily mean that you must grant the Philippines their independence, since, without being faithless, you could still retain your sovereignty over the islands should the Filipino people themselves, by common understanding with you, so desire, as the gentleman from Illinois thinks they might some day do. To those who assert that they do not want to retain the Philippines forever under the sovereignty of the United States, but that they would not vote for this preamble now because they do not believe that the day has yet arrived when independence should be granted, I say, if they are sincere in their protestations, they should vote for this preamble, because its language does not grant independence now, but simply states what they themselves admit to be their desire and their purpose. To those who believe in immediate independence I say that they should vote for this preamble because, while it does not grant immediate independence to the islands, it nevertheless does promise independence, and it is a long and decisive step toward actual independence.

Mr. Chairman, I shall now pass to another topic. Within a moment the committee will vote upon the bill, and I wish to say a word of sincere and deep-felt appreciation of the manner in which the membership of the committee on both sides of the House have acted in the consideration of this measure. I am personally obliged to them all for the unfailing courtesy and kindly consideration with which they have listened to my words and have received my suggestions. My people are likewise indebted to you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee. They owe you a debt of gratitude that will last during all the years to come as long as the Filipino people live, because, no matter what they do and how hard they try, they will never be able to discharge that immense obligation. For, after all is said, we are only an episode to you; you have lived and developed into what you are—a rich, enlightened, powerful commonwealth—without us; nay, without even knowing of us. Those ties that cause and explain the existence of sympathetic interest between peoples of different nationalities do not bind you to us—the ties of race, of common origin, of kinship. Whatever may be said as to whether we need you or not—whether we need you always or temporarily—there can be no question that you will be and continue to be what you are, occupying either with or without us the same leading place among the powers of the world you now do and doubtless advancing faster without us. The salaries that a handful of American employees draw from the Philippine Government are of no concern to you as a Nation. What part you may now or in the future take in the development of our trade you may as well enjoy it without responsibility for us. And yet, I have had one more occasion to see during the debate of this bill the true regard that you feel for the Filipino people. Yes, Mr. Chairman; I have had confirmation during the consideration of this bill for what I said at the opening of the debate. Referring to the remark of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] that the Democratic Party had not kept faith with me, I said that not only had the Democratic Party kept faith with me, but that all parties—yes, every party in the United States—seem to be trying to do what they can for the Filipino people.

Mr. Chairman, the plane on which the members of the Republican side of this House have pitched their opposition to this bill has been a high one. Save some rather unedifying political maneuvers of a kind that seems to be unavoidable in every legislative body, and save certain unpleasant allusions to a past happily ended or that never existed except in the imagination of a few people, the whole trend of the debate, the remarks that have been made on both sides, the feeling among the Members which I have closely watched, all went to show conclusively that those who are for the bill and those who are against the bill have alike been prompted by the honest belief, by the upright motive, that their attitude was demanded by the best interests of the Filipino people themselves.

I wish, therefore, Mr. Chairman, to offer the most cordial thanks not only to those who have the credit for bringing forward this bill, but also to those who opposed it on so noble a ground. I wish to thank Democrats, Republicans, and Progressives alike. I wish to express to the American people my strong gratification that through the consideration of this measure, important as it is for the welfare of my people and so decisive for their future, the good will of this Nation toward us has been once more manifested through all its representatives, irrespective of party politics.

Mr. Chairman, when I return home it will be my pleasure, as well as my duty, to tell my people that you are really our best friends—every one of you. There is only one difference, so far as I have been able to see, between the Democratic Party and the Republican Party—I say nothing of the Progressive Party, because it has not in its own capacity as a political body had opportunity to deal with us—and that difference is this, that the Democratic Party in trying to do by us what it thinks is the best is more precisely in accord with our wishes, while the Republican Party in trying to do by us what it thinks is best is disregarding our wishes. Since, in my opinion, every nation, like every individual, knows better than their neighbor what is best for them, it would seem that the Democratic Party is in all probability the one that will do precisely what is best for us.

The Republican Party was in power during the first 14 years following American occupation of the Philippines. During that time Republican Congresses were able to enact without being obstructed by the then existing minority legislation that accomplished some good things for us. The organic act which gave us the assembly, and the Payne-Aldrich bill which increased the opportunities of our farmers and our merchants, are the two most important elements in this legislation. It is proper, Mr. Chairman, that the minority should now cooperate with the majority. I hope, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the minority will find it convenient and wise, although withdrawing their approval if they so prefer, to let this measure pass unhindered, and also allow it speedily to become a law. And should it become a law we shall write with the fervor of gratitude in the annals of our country a glorious page bearing the names of the Members of the Sixty-third Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes of time to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment, which I desire to have read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Preamble, second paragraph, third line, after the word "islands," insert: "ceded to the United States Government by the treaty of peace concluded between the United States and Spain on the 11th day of April, 1899, the boundaries of which are set forth in article 3 of said treaty."

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, while section 1 was under consideration I made some remarks upon the desirability and importance of limiting the declared purpose of the United States to the territory ceded in the treaty referred to in the proposed amendment just read by the Clerk, thus leaving for future determination the disposition of the small islands of Cagayan Sulu, Sibutu, and others obtained from Spain by separate negotiation and purchase in 1900. I attempted at that time to show why it would be unwise to destroy at this time our freedom to legislate in the future with respect to these small islands, located hundreds of miles away from the Philippine Islands, which are in no proper sense a part of the Philippine Islands. I shall therefore not pursue that subject further now.

Mr. Chairman, while legislation for the Philippine Islands is important and is well worth while, still there has been no very great pressure or demand for it. We have spent enough time upon this measure to have considered and passed a rural credits bill. The call of the banks was heeded, and the banking and currency bill was passed, and they have passed back the plate for a couple of helpings since, and are again knocking at the doors of Congress for additional legislation. During all this time the farmers have been waiting—patiently, I was going to say—but that is hardly the word. They are waiting with great impatience for Congress to strike from them the shackles of excessive interest charges upon farm mortgages.

This anxiety and unrest upon the part of the farmers is forcibly set forth in a letter by Hon. David Lubin, the well-known representative of the United States at the International Institute of Agriculture, Rome, Italy, where he has rendered incalculable service to American agriculture. Mr. Lubin writes, under date of September 28, 1914, to a Member of this House, as follows:

Commenting on your several communications, I wish to say that you should have a serious talk with the Democratic leaders of the House, so that if they see their way clear they may exert proper effort in having House Joint Resolution 344 immediately passed by the House and by the Senate.

Apart from anything that has been said in the hearings, I would add the following:

1. The strength of Germany is directly due to the "Landwirtschaftsrat."

2. It can be easily adapted and adopted in the United States.

3. It would eliminate the trusts.

Please remember that I did not invent this "Landwirtschaftsrat"; it is no brilliant inspiration of mine; I am simply a reporter, and as such I tagged after the administrations of Roosevelt and Taft to take this up. They did take up something, but it was a faint shadow with no substance. So I sent out thousands of documents written so that the farmer "with mud on his boots" could understand.

And when the farmer began to squirm Mr. Taft, toward the end of his term, began to "get busy," but his cry was in an incomplete shape and went out entirely too late.

Then the Democratic Party came along and took hold of the lines and promised to give the farmer rural credits. The promise was given on the "give-me-liberty or give-me-death" style. The farmers were to have rural credits immediately, if not sooner. The farmer was to have the best and first place in the legislative trough, a trough to be supplied with good and rich legislative slops. He was to have it sure, right then and there; and the first installment was to be rural credits. "Sink or swim," "live or die," the farmer was to have it sure. Rural credits was his. The Democratic Party affirmed this over and over and over again. And a Democratic majority has now been in session for a longer period than any session ever in the history of the United States. So there was plenty of time for the Democratic Party to deliver the goods to the farmer. But, let me ask, what has the farmer got from this same Democratic Party up to this minute? What has he got in the form of rural credits? Do you know? Does anyone know? But perhaps this party has something practical up its sleeve for the next session in November. Well, if it is in the form of the Bulkley-Hollis bill, then it will all end in smoke.

There is a rural credit plan that can be adapted which is practical—the Landschaft. If we could make inquiries at this minute in Germany, we would find all other rural credit systems smashed; we would find the Government bonds depreciated, but we would find the Landschaft bonds just as they were before the war. The Democratic Party should have worked on the Landschaft, but it has not even caught onto a faint knowledge of what it is.

And now, to return to House joint resolution 344, if the Democratic Party allows this resolution to go into innocuous desuetude, it will prove itself truly to be the possessor of the long ears that we frequently see it pictured, for just as sure as the Democratic Party allows this "Landwirtschaftsrat" matter to go by default, it will be picked up and taken up by the Republican Party. What effective use this can be made of in practical politics will be evident to you if you will read over the hearings, and read it quietly, and pick out point 1, point 2, say, up to all the points that will count, and you will have a respectable number of counts, invaluable on the stump, invaluable in the papers, and damaging to the party who had the opportunity of handling this matter, but who either overlooked it by reason of a sluggish brain or, worse yet, for fear of offending the trusts; for, mark you, this proposal gives a death blow to the trusts, as you know, and as nothing else can do.

I presume that you have been informed that Creasy and his executive committee are now applying to the farmers generally for funds. Now, the greater part of these funds will, no doubt, be used in informing the farmers on this matter, in sending them, if you please, the hearings and other similar documents. In fact, a copy of this very letter is going to be sent to them, which they may send broadcast.

And now, and for all these reasons, as there is a short period yet of the session of this present Congress, there is ample opportunity to rush House joint resolution 344 through both Houses, provided, of course, that it is the will of the powers that be that this should be done.

Will you be good enough to inform me just what you propose to do in the matter; or, better yet, what you have done and what others have done, and what they have not done and what they would not do?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, is the time to read the amendment taken from the time on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. One minute.

Mr. TOWNER. That was merely to read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but the gentleman asked to have it read in his time.

Mr. MANN. He offered it as an amendment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But time was yielded to him.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Time was first yielded to him.

Mr. TOWNER. Very well. I now yield one minute of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, this bill, among other things, proposes to provide a better system of government for the Philippine Islands; and, so far as that feature is concerned, it is an improvement on the present system. The objectionable part of the bill is the preamble, which is skillfully worded and misleading. If adopted, it will be understood by the oriental Filipino mind and by other oriental peoples as a positive promise of speedy independence. The qualifying sentence of when "they may be better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence" will not be construed by them as postponing indefinitely their independence. They are capable of instituting an independent government now, although they may not be strong enough to maintain their independence and protect the islands against foreign aggression and annexation.

Their capacity for self-government may not be according to the American standards, but they could institute a government suited to their own lights and needs and degree of civilization. They would adapt their government to the conditions of life, habits of thought, and occupations of their people as affected by the climate, soil, and products of the islands, and their commercial and political intercourse with foreign States.

The adoption of the preamble to this bill will invite trouble, for if it should be adopted and the Philippines be not granted their independence within the next four or five years political agitators in the islands could easily incite an insurrection, which might have at least the moral support of the Orient behind it.

I will vote for the bill if you will strike out the preamble, or I will vote to grant the islands immediate independence if their people want it, provided the United States Government makes it plain that when once we withdraw from the islands we will not be drawn into a war on their account, that we will not protect them with force of arms against foreign aggression or annexation or domestic insurrection. Or I will vote to grant the Philippines independence under an international agreement entered into by the United States and other great powers—if it is possible to arrange such an agreement—guaranteeing in perpetuity the status of the islands as a free and independent state.

If the Philippine Islands were contiguous to the North American Continent, I would never vote for their separation from the United States. But they are located about 8,000 miles from us across the broad Pacific Ocean. They are peopled by an alien and nonassimilable race, with different habits of thought and mode of living. The climate is humid, hot, and to the Caucasian is enervating and unhealthful.

The possession of the islands is a source of weakness and danger, and they are of no material benefit to us as a dependency. Our trade relations with them could be made as advantageous if they were an independent nation as they are as a colonial possession.

I conceive that governing people as subjects and holding lands as colonial possessions is contrary to the genius of our free institutions.

We should strike out the preamble to this bill and, now that the question is before Congress, fix a definite time for Philippine independence or provide for their ultimate assimilation into the Union, first as Territories and then as States.

The Philippines as a whole is not a sparsely settled backwoods country. They number about 3,141 islands, ranging in size from 1 square mile to 40,969 square miles, which latter is the size of the island of Luzon. The actual land area of the islands is 115,026 square miles, or equal to that of the New England States added to that of New York and New Jersey.

The United States census of the islands in 1903 gave them a population of 7,635,426, mostly Malays; 7,000,000 are to a degree civilized, some of them highly civilized, and a few of the highest degree of culture. The wild tribes and non-Christian people numbered 647,740. Foreigners numbered about 50,000, of whom three-fourths were southern Chinese. There is no restriction on immigration into the Philippines, but there are very few Japanese in the islands, as its climate is as unadapted and unhealthful to the Japanese as it is to Americans.

Exclusive of the Army there were 8,135 Americans in the islands, nearly one-half of them being located in the city of Manila. The United States Census Bureau estimated the population of the islands in 1912 at 8,460,052. The density of population is about 76 per square mile. In continental United States it averages 26 per square mile. The population is made up of 25 different tribes, speaking 16 different native dialects.

Nearly all educated natives speak English or Spanish, or both, in addition to the language or dialect of their tribe. Seventy newspapers are published in the islands. The United States Government instituted the American system of public schools.

About 450,000 scholars are enrolled, and 7,671 teachers are employed, of whom 658 are Americans and the balance Filipinos.

During the year ending June 30, 1913, the Philippines imported from the United States merchandise amounting in value to $25,360,646 and exported to the United States $21,010,248 worth of merchandise. During the same period the total exports of the islands amounted to $33,834,438 and the total imports amounted to $30,948,498.

America has done much for the Filipino people. She freed them from the Spanish yoke by force of arms, and then paid Spain $20,100,000 for them. Under American rule the inhabitants of those islands for the first time in their history are safe in the enjoyment of their life, individual liberty, and property, and are protected from exploitation; and common schools are maintained for the education of their children, notwithstanding which they seem not to be satisfied with our government and desire to set up a government of their own, which I am perfectly willing they shall do with the understanding that when we withdraw from the islands our Army and Navy will not be used to protect them from foreign aggression or domestic insurrection.

Now, that the question is before Congress, we should in plain language declare the status of the islands and our intentions toward them, and not try to fool the people by the adoption of the preamble to this bill, which is only a string of whereases of glittering generalities couched in diplomatic language and, so far as the independence of the Philippines is concerned, may be construed in the light of future events to mean anything or nothing.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I admire the frankness with which the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] goes to the very meat of this matter.

He frankly admits the commercial appeal. He does not disguise the fact that the interest which he and his people have in the retention of the Philippine Islands is the possibility of gain from the connection. He is not like other gentlemen who have indulged in speech on this question and who get up here with nauseating cant and humbuggery, plain to everybody, which ought not to deceive a child, and tell us they want to retain the Philippine Islands and govern the Filipinos for the good of the Filipinos themselves. Surely, Mr. Chairman, no intelligent man can believe any such stuff as that. I thank the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] for having spoken so very plainly on that question.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield just a moment? You come from the South. The race proposition is not purely commercial, is it, there?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen from the Pacific coast are playing with fire. They are frightened by the prospect of a remote and improbable assault from a people who are hardly more than half our numbers and 6,000 miles away. They compare what they conceive to be theirs with the importance of other race problems, which I could but have not time to discuss. I have sympathized with them in their race problems, and I want to build up a barrier between the people of this country and alien races, when the association may lead to domestic or international trouble. I am in sympathy with them, but, sir, I shall not indulge in the humbuggery of saying that I do not want to sever the tie that binds that country to this, and which was not brought about by a mutual agreement at all, but put upon the Filipinos by force of arms, by saying that I am acting in their behalf.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington wants—and he states it frankly, for which I am obliged to him—to prevent Asiatics from coming into this country, but he wants to keep open the door swinging in that direction. He wants the privilege of going to the Philippine Islands and other Asiatic countries, no doubt including Japan, if he framed the thought that was in his mind, for the purpose of exploiting those people and those countries, and at the same time he wants to shut them out of this. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have always believed that there must be reciprocity in international affairs if we are to go along in comfort and in pleasant relations with the other peoples of the world. The Lord has given us a large portion of this globe, the fairest and best of it, I believe—in the Temperate Zone—suited to the people of our race and suited to our genius, and we should stay here and cultivate our own vineyard rather than precipitate troubles by trying to trespass on the rights of other people who are also created by the same Lord and given their share of inheritance in the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, any child ought to see that by going into Asiatic exploitation, by undertaking to exercise the rights of government in those far-away parts of the earth, we are inviting trouble.

It is amazingly inconsistent, Mr. Chairman, and sure to bring disaster for us to demand privileges for Americans which we do not accord other people. It is morally wrong and the height of political folly.

The gentleman from Washington says that the people on the Pacific coast have a race problem compared to which that of the Southern States pales into insignificance. The gentleman also says that he was brought up in the State of Louisiana and taught the fundamentals of democracy there. When I realize the opportunities of his youth and see how far he has gone astray in his maturity, I begin to doubt that the tree inclines as the twig is bent.

He says that the people of Japan are intelligent, that they possess ingenuity and ability in all lines, that they are proud, that they have an ancient aristocracy, and he gives us to understand that they are quick to resent an affront.

If the people of Japan are intelligent, and they certainly are, they can see and appreciate an act of injustice, and I believe they would regard the application of the political views of the gentleman as a gross act of injustice. What right have we to demand from them what we are unwilling to concede to them?

I repeat now what I said to the gentleman from Washington, what I said when I interrupted his speech. We have no right to demand admission to Japan, except upon precisely the same conditions on which we are willing to admit them to our country. That is a plan of operation which ought to appeal to the spirit of fairness of everybody.

And in that spirit of fair play I hope to see this Philippine question considered. It is not inconsistent with trade development. Indeed, I think the exact reverse is true. Real commercial expansion, the only sort with which, in my opinion, we should be concerning ourselves, is based on a mutually beneficial trade. Americans ought to be the last people to take any other view. Our ancestors resented the efforts of a British Government to govern the American Colonies for the sole benefit of the British people, and out of that resistance grew the Republic of the United States. A hateful overlordship did not conduce to trade then on this continent, and it will not do it now in Asia or elsewhere. We ought to have learned a lesson from our experience in South and Central America, where, in spite of proximity and similar political institutions, we have not very successfully competed with Europe. That failure has been largely due to suspicion of our political designs. Distrust and dislike do not make a good start for trade.

This bill does not go as far as I would like. It does give the Filipinos a scheme of government which is good, if ours is, for it is largely a duplicate, but above and beyond that it promises them in the preamble, which so disturbs Republicans and the hybrid offshoot from that organization, liberty and independence.

It is to the credit of the Filipinos that in the presence of superior armed forces and under the weight of government imposed by remote and alien people they have never ceased to declare their hope of ultimate independence.

I rejoice in the fact that there are in this country still an impressive number of people who clamor for liberty, justice, and fair play. I hope that clamor may never be hushed, for when the voice of protest against the violation of American fundamentals like those found in the Declaration of Independence is stilled, our own liberties will not merely be in peril, they will be lost.

As I have said several times in the course of this debate, this bill is merely the first step in a program of justice, a program which will end in the complete independence of the Filipinos. The establishment of a Philippine government will open to us an opportunity of retiring from adventures which are not pleasing to our own people, which are repugnant to the Filipinos, and which needlessly took us into the range of possible oriental conflict.

I see the Chairman has the gavel in the air, and I will close by saying that in my judgment the way to teach people to be independent is to give them independence. Liberty is not promoted by locking people in prisons. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the cavalier statesman of Texas—and that term is meant as complimentary—a moment ago stated that he was glad that certain Members did not deal with humbuggery, and he insinuated that the men who have claimed that the United States is maintaining an American occupation in the Philippines for the benefit of the Filipino are talking humbug. Now, I do not believe that this gentleman, who I do not think is inclined to impugn motives of men, has any ground for stating that those who insist that the American occupation there shall continue on the basis of the good to the Filipino as well as to the benefit of the world at large are talking humbuggery. I do not believe that that is a fair statement. In 1898 we received the Philippines as the result of a war which was not our own choice, the results of which were not of our own choosing; but when we received those islands we received an obligation with the islands, and there was no possibility of our performing that obligation by setting the islands free, and thus guaranteeing them what some persons might think they ought to have. Our duty compels us to fulfill the obligation, stay there as we have thus far done, and do a work the like of which the world has never seen before, and I am sure not since.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I believe if there is a man on the floor of this House who is sincere in wanting to retain the Philippine Islands for the benefit of the Filipinos, it is the gentleman from Ohio. I think he is deceived. But with reference to the obligation which he says we inherited as a consequence of that war, does he not believe we have cherished that obligation as an opportunity for exploitation?

Mr. FESS. I do not.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do.

Mr. FESS. I do not only say "no," but I say you do an injustice to the American people when you thus criticize our people after they have done the most remarkable piece of work, from the standpoint of cosmopolitan philanthropy, that the world has ever seen. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is no other case in the history of the world where a great Republic, with a people within its grasp, devoted its energy, its talent of brain and of heart, and its economic policies, to the good of the people, as in the case of the Government of the United States in its dealings with the Filipinos.

I have learned why the preamble is insisted upon; several Members have stated it. But I think it ought to go out of the bill, first, because it is totally unnecessary. The lawyer from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] who will speak later, will say the preamble can not be a part of any law. That being the case, in the name of goodness, why is it made a part of this bill? No other constructive measure, whether Federal or State, neither the Federal Constitution nor any State constitution, has a preamble in it, for the simple reason that the preamble is no part of the instrument. If it is no part of the instrument, then why put it in? I am opposed to it, first, because it is no part of the instrument, and as such can have no legal significance; and then, secondly, I am opposed to it because its results will be vicious. It will raise false hopes in the ambitious. It is misleading. And I am opposed to it, in the third place, for the reason that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] says they put it in because it is the will and testament of the Democratic Party to these people. My friend from Kentucky used harsh words in his reference to our treatment of the people of these islands. I can not understand the viewpoint of a Member who in reference to the American occupation and its results would employ the metaphor he used. His statement would indicate the American policy should be condemned at the very moment it is receiving the plaudits of all the world except the members of the majority party. The position he has taken to make this measure a Democratic will to the Filipinos deserves scrutiny.

Members of this House, can you justify writing a partisan platform into the terms of a measure designed to govern these people? That is what you intend to do. You have so stated in giving your reasons for the bill at this time. You have put in the beginning of the bill a preamble which you admit is no part of it, but is meant to maintain your pledge. It is the Democratic platform written into it. It is putting the legislation on the low plane of partisan affiliation. This legislation ought to be above that level. Both sides of this Chamber ought to be free from that charge. The Republican policy is to free this legislation and all insular legislation from partisan politics. This preamble, on the other hand, intending to write the Democratic platform in the bill, does not keep your promise as made. It is misleading as a Democratic promise, because whatever your purpose may be this preamble does not keep your promise. In 1900 you promised not what is in this preamble. You promised three things: First, to guarantee a stable government; and, secondly, independence; and, thirdly, to extend the Monroe doctrine over those islands. Those promises are not in the preamble.

I wonder whether anybody has noted the significance of attempting to extend the Monroe doctrine into the Asiatic islands? It would be the most serious single step that this Nation could take. If you say to Europe, "You must stay out of Central America and South America," how can we extend to the Asiatic islands the same protection, exemption from European colonization, unless we do it in agreement with other countries?

That is the promise you made in 1900. You repeated it in 1904, only changing the phraseology, saying that we ought to do with the Philippines what we did with Cuba. You repeated it again in 1908, and you have virtually repeated it in 1912, only two years ago.

But, Democratic Members, hear me. That platform that promised three specific things—stable government, independence, and guaranty of neutrality—you refused to write into this law, for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] introduced that very plank, and you voted it down in this House 4 to 1 the other day; and you raised the point of order to-day, and refused to allow it to come in. The Democratic policy has been specifically stated to do three things, all of which you rejected the other day and refused to accept to-day.

The Republican policy, on the other hand, has been not to promise, but simply to go on and do the work and fulfill the national obligation that came to us as the guardians of the islands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes' more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. FESS. Some one suggested a few moments ago that these people yearned for liberty. I rather think that that statement is true. Certain people yearn for liberty. But, my friends, you confuse liberty and independence. The two are not the same. Liberty can only come from regulation. There is no such thing as liberty without law. Liberty under law is real liberty. Liberty not under law is license. Mexico has no liberty, has she? I think my friend from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] would admit this, and he will also admit that Mexico has independence, and with the kind of independence she exercises she has lost her liberty; and in the degree that the independence of the Mexicans has been recognized they have forfeited their liberty.

I want to cite to you some striking examples: Australia has liberty, but not independence. New Zealand has liberty, but not independence. Canada has liberty, but not independence. Mexico has independence, but what can you say about her liberty? The Filipino has at this moment greater liberty in his participation in local government in over 700 towns than he would have if there was independence there.

Some one rose a while ago and said it is not a matter of what we think that we ought to fasten upon the people of the Philippines, but it is what they want. Now, my friends, that is a proposition that I resist. I say that it is a foolish statement, that the ward must control the action of his principal by his own wishes, his caprices, as it may be. The principal is acting in the interest of his ward, and what the action of the principal is is not to be determined by the mere wish or caprice of his ward. The principal ought to do what, in his judgment, the interest of his ward would command, and not the caprice of the ward. These 8,000,000 Filipinos now under the American Government, having seen in 16 years the most marvelous progress of any nation in the world, when viewed then and now, are at this moment enjoying such a participation in local self-government as other countries with independence do not enjoy. And as long as the American system will stay there in the interest of the Filipino, he will be secure in his enjoyment of liberty.

I want to repeat again: When I vote against this preamble I will vote against it, not because it was proposed by this Congress, and not because it has not been proposed by a Republican Congress, but because, first, it is useless; second, it is unnecessary; third, it is ill advised; and, fourth, it is vicious in holding out false hopes to the Filipino, stirring him, making him think that he has independence, and you here stating that he has not. My friends, I must vote against it, and my vote will be directed by my view of duty to the Filipino, and not by any other reason. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If the preamble were omitted, I should not withhold my support of the measure. The body of the bill is an attempt to increase participation in government, and is a step nearer to that goal. But any attempt to hold out to either the Filipino or the world that the United States will abandon these islands is too preposterous a proposition for me to support. Under the circumstances under which we assumed the obligation the Republican Party could not indorse this piece of Democratic jugglery.

Mr. Chairman, the Philippine Islands came to us as a result of war. Their possession by us was the least of our intentions when we took up arms against Spain in behalf of humanity. The irony of the situation is revealed by the inconsistency of mankind. When the Republican President of the country was doing his utmost to hold at bay the dogs of war, Democratic leaders, in and out of Congress, were loud in their condemnation of the lack of backbone of McKinley. When at last the war was on, and Spain was driven from Cuba and the Philippines, these same leaders, or many of them, denounced the President for accepting the results of war.

Before the war began they denounced the head of the Government for his inaction. When the war ended they denounced him for his action. Even to-day we hear from irresponsible babblers the Philippine policy referred to as "horrible carpetbag government."

The Republican Party showed the courage necessary to complete a work that was once begun. After having driven Spain from the islands, it did not sulk behind the flimsy excuse of irresponsibility to withdraw the majesty of the Republic and leave those islands as rich prizes to be exploited by whatever government that might set up a claim to them.

The Republican Party looked upon the situation as a national obligation to the Filipino created by our arms. That obligation the party has steadily fulfilled. The fulfillment has up to date occupied 16 years of constructive nation building. These years offer a challenge to the world. They will record the most advanced methods of modern civilization exemplified in any section of the world. These years will reveal a consecration of talent of brain and heart and sound business methods never before displayed by a superior toward an inferior people. The record thus far is made up. The past at least is secure. The future is dependent upon the contingency of a Democratic administration now tampering with the welfare of those people.

What has been the attitude of the party now in power toward the Philippine problem?

As I said before, two years after those people became our wards the Democratic Party declared against the Republican policy and demanded three specific things: The United States must guarantee a stable government, Philippine independence, and extend the Monroe doctrine over the islands.

It goes without saying that so long as the United States remained in control all of these features were assured. But the Democrats demanded our withdrawal, and at the same time our guaranty of conditions which would not permit our withdrawal, a most glaring inconsistency not only in fact, but in terms as well.

In 1904 the party in convention assembled virtually repeated its declaration of four years before.

In 1908 it reaffirmed its former position, and in 1912 repeated it.

Four times in national conventions the party now in power denounced the Republican policy in the Philippines, which, outside of the Democratic junta, has won the admiration of all the world, and as often has declared for independence and neutralization of the islands.

To-day the party controls all the lawmaking machinery of the Government.

It has a majority in this House equal to the entire minority, and is capable of steam-rolling any sort of a measure it sees fit to propose. It controls the Senate with less ruthless methods. It has the Executive, or rather it better be said, the Executive has it, for to an onlooker the Congress is little more than a Punch and Judy performance. Its performance under the new rôle is a splendid exhibition of "Babes in Toyland."

Now, with the entire machinery within complete control of the party which for 16 years has denounced Republican rule, and which has demanded independence and neutralization, in platform and on the stump, what does it propose?

This bill, which, outside of the preamble, is but a copy of the organic act of 1902. Aside from a few minor items, the bill is the Republican organic act of a dozen years ago. The only Democratic feature of it is found in the preamble, which is the one mischievous item in the entire work.

The bill proper does not have a single item of independence or neutralization in it.

It does not only avoid these items, but, as I before stated, when the Member from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] offered his amendment looking to fulfilling the various promises made in at least four national campaigns the Democratic House voted down the amendment 4 to 1.

What has become of these promises made when the party was out of power? Then its function was denunciation. Now, when all power is in its hands, what does it offer? It falls back in this case, as in most others, upon Republican laws as a basis for operation, and offers the empty promise in the form of a preamble which can not be a part of the law.

Here we have the striking example of the incompetency of this Congress. For the first and only time, so far as is known in history, we are offered an organic act for the government of a people with the platform of a political party affixed as a preamble.

To say nothing about the mischievous results of attempting to stamp a partisan significance upon a plan of government of eight millions of people by adding a party platform to the law, and the equally dangerous step which places a new weapon into the hands of ambitious politicians to be employed in their efforts of propaganda, what should be said of a Congress which is willing to write a promise as a part of the law which it concedes can not be any part of the law, and thus deceive millions of people as to the significance of the promise?

No man will deny that a preamble has no legal effect. It is no part of the law to which it is affixed. If it can not be effective, what is the purpose of affixing it? Whatever be the purpose, it can have but one effect, namely, mislead the people for whom the law is written. On the face of the law it appears as a part of it, to become effective. In reality it can not be a part of it and can have no legal effect. To the Filipino it says independence is granted when stable government is established. He asks, When is that? If not now, then you give us nothing we have not had before. The one difference between Republican and Democratic policies is, Republicans seek performance and Democrats are satisfied with promises.

Mr. Chairman, I look upon this preamble as a most vicious innovation in legislation. As before stated, it is the only case of its kind in legislation of this sort, so far as I know.

From the Federal Constitution of 1787 down to the last State constitution—of Ohio, in 1912—numbering more than 60 documents, all told, so far as I can ascertain not a single one contained a preamble. This is not confined to the State constitutions, but extends to the territorial governments of the various States, to Alaska, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines. True it is that the Articles of Confederation of 1781–1787 did have a preamble, but all students of political science agree that this instrument was so weak and ineffective that it broke down immediately and had to be superseded within six years of its adoption. The pitiable situation is disclosed in the willingness of this House to inject an unwise, ill-advised deception as the very first act of this Congress in its legislation touching the Filipinos, not to give any legal status, which a preamble can not do, but to write a Democratic plank in the law, which can have but one effect—to hold out to the Filipino a false promise which can not be effective and can only work mischief in the islands. The Republican policy is the only wise procedure. The administration since American occupation speaks for itself. The eating of the pudding is the best proof. We have gone step by step, testing the capacity of these people for self-government. We have extended that principle as fast as men trained in that art say we can go. In 16 years wonders have been accomplished. This has been carried on without raising false issues or holding out false promises. The Republican policy is one of doing, not of promising. I here and now warn the Democratic Members of this Congress against inaugurating false pretensions, which can have no good results either for Filipinos or Americans.

If you are able to continue the wonderful work accomplished since American occupation you will be fortunate. Otherwise the future holds for you its severest condemnation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to my colleague from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, this bill is, in my opinion, a distinct contribution to the ultimate solution of the Filipino problem. That solution, sooner or later, must eventuate in the form of an independent and autonomous government for the people of those islands.

I say "independent," because eventually the Filipino people will have this independence, whether by voluntary action on our part or by the exercise of force on their part. In other words, sooner or later, and in one way or another, the tide of freedom in those islands will rise to the level of independence.

And on our part, Mr. Chairman, we are in no position to withhold from these people their ultimate independence. There is no place under our system of government for colonial dependencies. The Constitution gives us no authority to hold territory unless for temporary purposes and for final dedication to statehood. If these islands are retained by us as colonial dependencies, then we violate our whole system of government. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, if we were right in our policy as respects Cuba, we are wrong in the contrary policy to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. Chairman, I am not for hurrying the Filipino people to independence or self-government. I would concede an abundance of time to these islanders to test their capacity for self-government. I do not think that you can fit government upon these people as you can fit a suit of clothes upon a man. I realize, as every student of history must, that governments of the same name differ widely in powers and practices. For example, the Republic of Venice was not the Republic of Florence. The Republic of Switzerland, after throwing off the yoke of Austria, was quite different from the Republic of Holland after emerging from the oppression of Spain. Indeed, the present French Republic differs from the second, and the second differed from the first, and all of these Republics differ from that of the United States.

But, Mr. Chairman, the expressions of Presidents McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft, as well as the great current of American thought, have all been to the end that the Filipino people should have their own government, after sufficient training and opportunity to absorb American ideals and systems. President McKinley eloquently declared that forcible annexation was criminal aggression. The argument to be drawn from this aphorism is that we should assume for a time the great trust of helping these people to appreciate and understand the genius and working of self-governing institutions. If this be not so, why have we toiled and sacrificed and fought to give the Filipinos an adequate appreciation of the benefits of the Government which we have adopted and which we so devoutedly revere?

Many of the arguments, Mr. Chairman, made here today by gentlemen on the other side of this House are quite contradictory and irreconcilable. The motives underlying these arguments I do not question, though the partisanship which imputes only the base method of party supremacy or immediate party victory to this side of the House is neither creditable nor convincing in discussing a measure of this magnitude. I have great respect and good will for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] who has just spoken; yet if his argument be sound, we have been blind leaders of the blind in that far eastern archipelago. This distinguished gentleman enumerates with zeal the contributions made by America to the education and development of the Filipino people. He seems to forget that we can not stir the passions of liberty among these people or educate them to appreciation of self-government and then restrain the influences and forces that grow out of liberty and intelligence. We can not give these people education, imbue them with the blessings of liberty, and then make no reply to their insistent and ardent inquiry as to how or when we will give them the right to stand alone among the Governments of the earth.

The policy, Mr. Chairman, disclosed on the other side of the House, consists alone in counseling delay or the suppression of any declaration of purpose or policy save an implied assent to a continuance of the existing status. When the Filipino people ask when they may expect any change, the answer on the other side of the aisle is, "Not now; wait."

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have but five minutes, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I was just going to ask the gentleman whether this bill fixes the time?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will soon come to that, but the gentleman from Ohio has just gone into refined disquisitions as to the distinction between liberty and independence. Does the gentleman think that in 1776 the American Colonies would have been satisfied with a promise of liberty from Great Britain, but a withholding of our independence at the same time? If so, there would have been no Declaration of Independence. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I care very little for the details of this bill, except for the preamble containing the declaration of the purpose of the American people, and the torch to light the hopes and aspirations of the Filipino people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I regard the preamble as declaring a probationary state into which the Filipino people will enter in order to demonstrate their fitness for free institutions. I construe the preamble as a substantive assurance of independence, as I construe in turn the text of the bill to lay down certain tests to determine the extent of our promise and the fitness of the Filipino people to assume that independence In other words, the preamble of the bill is an American declaration of opportunity to the Filipino people, just as the text of the bill itself gives to the Filipino people liberty, power, and opportunity to test the declaration and purposes embraced in the declaration. We declare that we will give them independence when they deserve it, and to this end we furthermore lay down certain governmental functions which we ask the Filipino people to assume and perform, and when done then the extension of free government or independence will be given them.

It was never the purpose, as it can not be the right, of the United States to withhold from the Filipino people a declaration of our purpose respecting their ultimate independence. We can not continuously say in answer to their prayers for independence, "Not to-day, not to-morrow," and so on.

Mr. COOPER. Suppose the reply is "never."

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I hope to reach his suggestion in a moment. I was about to say that I agree with the statement made on the opposite side of the House awhile ago that the promise contained in the preamble is dependent upon certain exigencies hereafter to happen. I do not shrink from that argument. I embrace it gladly. For, I repeat, the essence of the declaration contained in the preamble is not as to time, but as to substance. This declaration to the Filipino people is, to use the language of the street, when you "make good" of the liberties and opportunities given you, then we will keep our promise as to independence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The distinguished leader of the Republican Party [Mr. MANN] seems to voice the present attitude of his party when he declares that the Filipinos are never to have independence, but must remain always under the guardianship of the United States. He declares it is "our duty, first, to keep the Filipinos under the flag of the United States, and, second, to make them our friends." With all respect to the gentleman, his propositions are irreconcilable. You can "never keep the Filipinos" and at the same time make them your friends. [Applause on the Democratic side.] To hold people against their will and to have their friendship at the same time belong to those irrepressible conflicts ever existent in human nature.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. We kept the South, and they are still our friends, I believe, which is a very good illustration.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman can not lead me into an argument of that kind, because the analogies are so wide apart.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman will admit that the statement is true.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman admit that the people of the same flesh and blood, and existing on the same soil and under the same Government, are analogous to the Philippine situation?

Mr. MANN. We made them our friends, did we not?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I fear the gentleman's prejudices have confused his logic. I prefer not at this time to discuss the analogies involved in the gentleman's question.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. The South has been far better to the Union than the gentleman from Illinois has been to the South.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, alluding to the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], I would emphasize his assertions as to what the American Government has done for the Filipinos. We have endeavored to give them American institutions, American ideals and standards, American civilization. What does this mean? It means aspirations for liberty; hopes for independence. It means public free schools; and I beg you to observe every time a book is put into one hand of a Filipino boy, sooner or later, if you withhold his independence, there will be a sword in the other hand. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Endow liberty with intelligence, and the people will soon have a passionate glory that will eventuate in independence, even though the sword be necessary to this end.

Mr. Chairman, some rather strange arguments have been submitted during this debate. I call attention to only one at this time. It is contended that the permanent retention of the Philippine Islands under our flag is necessary as a great peace measure. That these islands, 10,000 miles from our western shores, are the sentries and the fortresses to exhibit and protect American liberty in the Pacific. Aye, that war is as certain to come between the far eastern or Asiatic races and ourselves as "the sun rises and sets," and for the necessities of our Government, for the peace and civilization of America, we must hold these islands. They are our rock and our defense in the hour of certain conflict. The answers to these arguments are many and conclusive, but I only wish at this time to submit that distance and separation diminish as proximity and propinquity increase the causes of war. It is not, Mr. Chairman, our western continental boundary, washed by the Pacific, but our far eastern islands, close to the shores of China and Japan, that must give occasion for apprehension.

I further submit that a continuance of our possession and government of these islands will inexorably result in the establishment and maintenance of militarism of prodigious proportions, imposing immense burdens upon our people and necessarily provoking the suspicion and ill will of the contiguous nations in this archipelago.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, basing our policy of retention upon material considerations, I submit that our commerce will be greater, our relations will be happier, when we have opportunely and wisely relaxed our hand and our guidance and given to these islands our good will and affectionate sympathies. When this fortunate day comes the altruism and majesty of America will command the respect and admiration of the civilized world. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that we have only one speech on this side.

Mr. JONES. Only one speech on that side? Will the Chair kindly inform me how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has 24 minutes remaining.

Mr. TOWNER. And how much on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has 18 minutes remaining.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, in opening the discussion upon this bill, now more than two weeks ago, I said all I cared to say in respect to this preamble. I showed, I think, that it does not go further in promising the Filipinos their independence than McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft repeatedly went in declarations made by them. The only difference is that those were declarations which are not now regarded as binding upon the Republican Party, although those distinguished gentlemen were when they made them the recognized leaders and spokesmen of that party.

The gentleman from the State of Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has just informed us that the Democratic Party was the only party that had ever declared for Philippine independence, and he evidently seemed to think that that fact was a reproach to it.

Mr. Chairman, the only reason why, in my opinion, the Republican Party has never authoritatively and definitely—never in any national platform—declared its position upon this transcendently important question is that it lacked either the honesty or the courage to do so. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, there are no brighter pages in the glorious history of the Democratic Party than those upon which are written the declarations of that party in favor of Philippine independence, and none that gives me more pride, for it is a source of infinite joy and pride to me that there is at least one party in this land of liberty and freedom that still believes in the principles enunciated by the greatest apostle of human liberty the world has ever produced, the ablest as well as the most courageous champion of free popular government known to ancient or modern history.

Mr. Chairman, it is enough for me to know that in favoring a declaration promising Philippine independence I am following the teachings of Thomas Jefferson and obeying the mandates of the party founded by him, which alone of all the parties in this Nation has the courage of its honest convictions. It should never be forgotten, by any Democrat at least, that it was Thomas Jefferson who gave voice to the imperishable truth that "every man and every body of men on earth possesses the right of self-government." Said he: "They receive it with their being from the hand of nature."

Mr. Chairman, the preamble to this bill but states in different words the utterance of the father of the Democratic Party that "the people of every country are the only safe guardians of their own rights." Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a copy of a letter received by a Member of Congress from the Hon. Francis Burton Harrison, the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, and written as recently as the latter part of August, in which he comments at considerable length upon this bill. I now desire to read one or two extracts from this letter. He writes of it:

> I believe the solid and substantial people in the islands, among both Americans and Filipinos, are generally in favor of the bill, and that it will prove satisfactory here.
> To my mind the most important feature of the whole bill is the recital in the preamble of the intention of the United States to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein. Without that feature the bill would be received with very, very great disappointment in the islands. It would also be a very serious disappointment to me. Ever since our acquisition of the Philippines, each administration has given to the Filipinos assurances in that general direction. To omit from the bill a statement of that sort now would seem to the Filipinos a reversal of what they have understood to be the American policy, and a failure to perform what they believed to be our promises. The result would be most unsatisfactory, indeed, and would infinitely aggravate the difficulties of the United States in governing these 9,000,000 people.

Mr. Chairman, this is what the Governor General of the Philippine Islands has to say of this bill. In his deliberate opinion, to omit such a declaration of the Nation's purpose as to the future political status of the Philippine Islands as is contained in the preamble to this bill would be a serious disappointment to him, and, moreover, would infinitely aggravate the difficulties of the United States in governing the 9,000,000 of Filipino people. Shall we then heed the words of Gov. Gen. Harrison when he tells us that the solid and substantial people in the islands, both American and Filipinos, favor this bill or listen to and be misled by the uninformed and irresponsible asseverations of those who, lacking in sympathy with the aspirations of the Filipino people for freedom, would deny to them their independence?

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the statements that have been made here upon the floor of the House abundantly prove the truth of what I said at the commencement of this discussion and the consideration of this bill. It is a political bill, pure and simple. In its inception it is political. It was reported here for a political purpose, and it is considered here for a political purpose, and is kept here for a certain length of time for a political purpose. The gentleman who has just left the floor tells us that the Governor General, representing his party in the Philippine Islands, says that the principal thing in the bill is its preamble. It would be a great disappointment, he says, to the people of the Philippine Islands if this preamble is not passed. I wonder if that kind of statement satisfies the Filipino people? They are demanding immediate independence, and have been demanding it for years. Two years ago the chairman of this committee and the majority of this committee reported a bill which was considered to be the exposition of the Democratic position at that time—a bill in which they granted to the Filipinos independence, at least qualified independence. During a period of eight years the United States was to exercise supervisory control over them, but there was a Republic instituted. It was called the Philippine Republic. It had the form and insignia of an independent government with very few exceptions, indeed. It promised that absolute independence at the expiration of the period of eight years should be given the Philippine Government. What has become of that bill? It is not here before us to-day. There is no such bill under consideration now. There is no promise to the Filipino people of independence now, unless we are expected to take seriously the language used in the bill—that they will grant the people of the Philippine Islands independence when a stable government is established.

There is a stable government established there now, and they are not given independence. If the one established is not "stable," what kind of a government would be stable, and how can it be secured? What is the standard by which we can know when independence may be given? Gentlemen contend there is a stable government, a good government, there now. They contend that these people are able to maintain it, and yet they say, "No; we will not give it to them until they establish a stable government." But how can they establish a stable government unless you give them a chance to try, unless you give them immediate independence. That you should have the courage to do if you believe in it. If you do not, you are violating not only your promises made to them through your leaders from year to year for the last 10 or 12 years, but you are violating the promises you made to them when you drew and introduced the former Jones bill and said you intended to pass it just as soon as you had control of the Government. And you are violating your promises to them now when you say this leads to independence.

It is suggested here that the passage of this bill with its preamble will give a great satisfaction to the Filipino people. Let us see whether or not it will, and the testimony which I offer will not be impeached from the Democratic side of the House. I have in my hand the organ of the Filipino people in the United States, edited by my brilliant friend the representative from the Philippines, MANUEL QUEZON. In this, speaking to the Filipino people regarding the bill, under as late a date as July of this year, he says in the leading editorial regarding the new Jones bill:

We have thus set forth in colorless terms the significance of the new bill. That it will be a disappointment to many who had hoped that the present administration of the United States intended to effect the immediate separation of the Philippines from the domination of America, we have no doubt.

That is the good news that will be carried to the Filipino people when you pass this bill. That is the good news that will be carried to all those people in the Philippines longing for immediate independence, and believing that they ought to have it. And if in connection with that story they are told that each succeeding two years of time a new bill is introduced which grants to the Filipinos less power than its successor, the Philippine people will understand what is meant by the promises that the Democratic Party are giving to them. My distinguished friend from Virginia made a very significant statement when he was on the floor this afternoon. I allude to my friend, Gov. MONTAGUE, when he used this language:

I care very little for this bill except the preamble.

I wonder if people understand really the significance of that? The preamble is purely political, made for political purposes. It can not help the Filipino people one particle. It is not even a promise on which anybody under any circumstances can rely for anything, and yet my friend from Virginia says, "I care very little for this bill except the preamble."

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman will note that I was speaking very rapidly. What I meant to state was that in the sense of proportion the preamble was far more important than the items of the bill itself, and not that I do not think highly of the text or the subject matter of the bill. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me further, he has just said, "Suppose you take less and less from the Philippines each succeeding Congress." I reply, "Suppose, more and more of the rights of free government are given by each succeeding Congress to the Philippines." What then will be the result? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TOWNER. My good friend spoke, probably instinctively, just what his party believes and always has believed. They do not care for the Filipino people; they never did. They do not now care for the islands, and never did.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I hope the gentleman will not put me in that category.

Mr. TOWNER. No; I am not. I am speaking of the gentleman's party now.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have not spoken of this as a party question.

Mr. TOWNER. It makes no difference whether the gentleman has or not, he has voiced his party's position, and that is what Democrats now believe. They only desire to get rid of the islands on any terms and as soon as possible. It makes no difference to them about the terms of this bill, whether it gives better government or larger liberty or greater privileges or a better chance in the world. It makes no difference to them whether they receive more education, whether they secure a greater opportunity to really enjoy liberty under the terms of the bill.

But they really enjoy playing politics with it. It is very amusing and affords opportunity for saying such fine things about "liberty" and the "consent of the governed."

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly; I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman has made a strong indictment against the party of which I am a humble member. Does he remember the Scripture text, "By their fruits ye shall know them"?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I do. I remember that text well, and I want to know whether or not the Democratic Party has ever given the Philippine Islands or any man there anything that has not been under Republican laws and an adoption of Republican policies from the beginning?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TOWNER. I can not yield further.

Mr. Chairman, the fact is that this whole system of government that is now instituted and under which the Philippines have made this marvelous progress was formulated and instituted by the Republican Party. There has not been one single law placed upon the statute books by any Democrat at any time.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman let me ask him just one question?

Mr. TOWNER. I will yield for one question.

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask the gentleman if it was not the Democratic Party that gave the Filipinos the control of both branches of their legislature?

Mr. TOWNER. The Democratic Party? No. Your President merely appointed one more man on the Philippine Commission, belonging to the Filipino people, than had been there before.

Mr. JONES. Did not that give them control?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly, it gave them control, and the control is exercised, and there has been no change in the policy of the party in the Philippine Islands. It is exercised under the laws that were placed upon the statute books by the Republicans.

Mr. Chairman, the Republican Party has been the only friend that the Filipino people have ever had. It has stood by them through all these years, giving them a continual and larger measure of liberty. It has given to them education; it has given them a real understanding of what liberty means. Under their direction the Filipino people have been enabled to make their strongest showing that they are capable of independence. I do not object to their ambition. I think it is a splendid tribute to them that they are capable of indulging in this dream, nay, this expectation, if you choose to call it such, of independence, I hope they may attain it in the future, if that is then their wish; but I hope still more that when the time comes, when they are capable of exercising the right of self-government and entire independence, they will believe that it will be better for them, as I believe it will be better for us, if they shall keep at least a measure of association with the United States. I believe that the time will come when the Filipino people will themselves realize that.

Mr. Chairman, the belief seems to exist in many minds that we can easily secure the neutralization of the islands, and that will settle the whole difficulty. I think, gentlemen can hardly understand what is meant by neutralizing the islands. Every nation in the world is perfectly willing to recognize the neutrality of the islands, but that will be of no benefit to the Philippine Islands. In order to be any protection to them you must secure a treaty guaranteeing neutrality to the Philippine Islands. But what nation will do that? Any nation perhaps that may be allowed to exploit the islands. We have never exploited the islands and we will never agree that any other nation shall exploit them. No nation will undertake to guarantee the neutrality of the Philippine Islands unless it will be to their advantage to do so. You can not expect that. Do you believe that Great Britain, or Germany, or France will assume the responsibility of guaranteeing the neutrality of the Philippine Islands unless it shall be of some benefit to them? Will they accept such a burden merely for altruistic purposes, merely for the purpose of helping the Philippine Islands? No, they will say to the United States, "You are doing that; you are taking care of the Philippine Islands; that is your responsibility; you have to guarantee their integrity and protect them. Why should we do so? That is your responsibility and not ours." They will say to us, "If there are any particular inducements you can offer, if you have any special concessions to make, if you can make it of interest to us, we may consider your proposition," and that is what it will be impossible for us ever to do. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if all amendments that are to be voted upon have been offered? They should be before the closing speech is made. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] if there are any other amendments to be offered?

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that I know of none.

Mr. JONES. They ought to be offered now, as the gentleman will understand.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. JONES. I yield that much time to my colleague on the committee, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, we are about to do a great thing. The distinguished but very partisan philosopher from Ohio [Mr. FESS], in company with a number of other gentlemen, has declared against the preamble to this bill. They say in one breath that they are against it because it means nothing, and say in the next breath they are against it because it means so much. Measuring their utterances in the light of the speech delivered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a few days ago, I am constrained to believe that the expression in the latter breath presents the reason for their opposition.

Gentlemen know that the passage of this bill, with its preamble, means the taking of a decisive and definite step toward the consummation of an event which will be not only epochal, but unprecedented in the history of human kind—the voluntary and willing withdrawal of sovereignty by one people from over another people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Strange as it may seem and is, every step which has been taken toward human liberty, the natural state of man, has been taken across the forms of battle-slain dead, and blood-stained flags are the only emblems that signal across the centuries the accomplishment of fundamental governmental things. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not from fear, but because we are just, we are ready to take this step toward the reversal of that age-old rule of cruelty and barbarism and selfishness. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The issue has been clearly drawn here, if it had not been drawn before, by the utterances of the minority leader [Mr. MANN] in his terse but comprehensive speech made upon this floor, and it has been suggested again and again throughout the course of this debate that his speech has not been answered save by a sneer. Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake to answer it with a sneer. I noticed that while the gentleman from Illinois was delivering that speech he looked not once upon that portrait of Washington yonder, or upon that portrait of La Fayette there. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The central thought of the gentleman's speech was that we must hold these islands forever, because a great contest, either military or commercial, is to come. If, sir, it is to be a military contest, who does not know that those islands present our one source of military weakness? [Applause on the Democratic side.] If it is to be a commercial contest, what then?

Mr. Chairman, I know something of commercial life. I have known men in the commercial world, from the smallest merchant up to those somewhat euphemistically termed "great captains of industry," and my observation has been that that merchant, whether great or small, that commercial man, whether large or little, was the most successful, was the most honored in life and in death, who acted upon principles of justice and kept his plighted faith. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Nations are made up of individuals. The type is as the person. And I say now to the gentleman from Illinois that that nation will have the fairest chance in the future contest for commercial supremacy which lives by the principles of justice and acts in the light of superb and splendid ideals. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But I need not in my poor way attempt to answer the gentleman from Illinois. That speech was answered long before it was ever uttered. It is not necessary to go back through the misty ages that are gone and read the philosophy of the ancients; you need go no further back than the adoption of the Declaration of Independence, wherein it was declared that "all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." [Applause on the Democratic side.] The speech of the gentleman from Illinois was answered by every sword ring in the hand of an American soldier in every battle of the American Revolution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The darkness has not yet fallen. The roll call will begin in a few moments. When it begins and before you vote suppose you gentlemen walk out upon the portico which adorns the south end of this magnificent Capitol building wherein we sit, turn your eyes to the west, and look there upon the massive Washington Monument, its peak tinted now by the evening October sun, builded to the memory of a man who stood for the principle that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and you will find there an answer to the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I walked on Sunday last out through beautiful Arlington, under the trees all saturated and shot through with sunshine, looked upon the graves of men who died for their respective countries, and I said to myself, "Why, here is an answer to the speech of the gentleman from Illinois."

Must I go further? In the capital city of the gentleman's own State there is a mausoleum. I have never seen it, but I am told that it is simple and splendid, as befits the memory of the man whose ashes rest within it. Abraham Lincoln was the first great leader of the Republican Party. He anticipated and answered the speech of the present leader of the Republican Party when he said, "No man is good enough to govern another man without that man's consent." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I wish, sir, that it were possible at this time, in this solemn and sacred hour, to lay aside the prejudices of the past and determine that we shall not "stain the virtuous character of our enterprise" by partisanship or factional differences. We are preparing now to tread the mountain range of human life. I wish you gentlemen on the Republican side might come up out of the murk and the fog and walk with us in the sunlight. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Idealistic, you say? Let us grant that it is even so. I am not ashamed to support the ideals for which my fathers stood. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We shall do a great thing when we take this step; we shall do a great thing when we maintain in its purity that ideal which has been the guiding star of our own national life. We shall do a great thing, and this shall be a historic day. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. CANTOR. Can we have it reported, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. There are three amendments.

Mr. MILLER. I have offered three amendments.

Mr. JONES. Can we have them reported, Mr. Chairman, in the order in which they were offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, after the word "stable," in line 4 of the second paragraph, insert the word "representative," so that the line will read, as amended, "to recognize their independence as soon as a stable representative government can be established therein."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, after the word "established," in line 4 of the second paragraph, insert the words "and maintained."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, after the word "therein," in line 4 of the second paragraph, insert the following: "Provided, That the people of the Philippine Islands shall desire their independence expressed by a majority vote of the qualified electors at the general election held next after it shall be decided that a stable government can be established."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MILLER) there were—ayes 33, noes 100.

So the amendment was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

The Clerk read as follows:

In the preamble, second paragraph, third line, after the word "islands," insert the following: "ceded to the United States Government by the treaty of peace concluded between the United States and Spain on the 11th day of April, 1899, the boundaries of which are set forth in article 4 of said treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, under the rule I think the committee rises without any motion.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ADAIR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to with the preamble, and that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I take it that under the practice laid down in the Manual the question now comes on the preamble. The Manual says in a note:

In the practice of the House of Representatives the preamble of a bill or joint resolution is agreed to most conveniently after the engrossment and before the third reading.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 214, nays 62, answered "present" 4, not voting 149, as follows:

COTTON WAREHOUSES.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, in a recent Washington dispatch to a Georgia paper announcing my introduction of a bill to relieve the cotton producers the correspondent added:

The Georgia Congressman has assurances from his colleagues of support which he believes will assure the passage of the bill.

That is a solid, honest paper, with a conscientious management. The sentence added in the dispatch is a pardonable gratuity. The optimistic correspondent, with a good heart, wished to say something pleasant, if not sensational, so he added the cheerful fabrication as to assurance of support and belief in passage. Newspaper statements attributing to Congressmen hope of securing this sort of legislation and reckless statements of politicians not in Congress have resulted in unfortunate misapprehension on the part of the people and aroused in them hope of Federal legislation. Then an effort has been made by the same newspapers and politicians to prejudice the minds of the people by alleging that Congressmen have promised to secure specific Federal legislation with definite results.

The appalling disaster visited upon the South is lamentable enough without being aggravated by the play of cheap politics and unjust charges against Congressmen, producing distrust among the people. The newspapers and politicians do not even specify any particular Congressmen as guilty of making such promises, but with a general sweep of indiscriminate denunciation charge Congress in general with being recreant in failing to provide relief for emergency conditions in the South, as though Congress, forsooth, had promised to do so. Some men assert in the papers that apathy or opposition of some southern Congressmen, without specifying which, is responsible for failure to secure relief.

On their face these statements appear ridiculous. I doubt not that every Member of Congress sympathizes with the South in suffering the irreparable blow which has fallen upon her without her fault and without warning. I believe every Representative here will agree that Members from the Southern States have been earnest and active, in season and out of season, to find some way to meet the demands of the situation. When the universal war began it peremptorily stopped the mills and closed the markets which usually take two-thirds of our cotton crop. No matter how short the war might be it came at a time when the cotton crop was ready to be placed on the market. That crop not only represented the labor of the producers but also all their credit. To supply them credit to produce that crop required all the capacity of the landlords, the supply merchants, and the local banks, and the banks strained their credit in the money centers to supply credit to the merchants and landlords. That crop, with by-products, the day before hostilities began represented considerably more than a billion dollars. The crop is not too large under normal conditions. The world needs every bit of it. On the average the people who produced it have not nor ever had one-third as much cotton goods as they really need.

If normal conditions had permitted them to realize the value of their cotton, the profit of the crops would have enabled them to supply their needs and thereby utilize every bit of the artificial surplus we hear so much about the necessity of retiring. If they were allowed enough profit to enable them to use what cotton goods they need themselves, their own demands would furnish a better market than all the East, and consume one-third of the entire crop. The foreign markets having entirely closed, the domestic mills, never having furnished a market for more than one-third, were unable to meet the emergency and supply a market for the entire crop, and conditions being so uncertain that they did not know what to depend on in the general confusion and calamity, they decided they were afraid to buy at all, so they virtually destroyed the market for the other third, declining to buy cotton except in dribbles as they could consume it. Then, the entire demand being removed and all markets closed, the law of supply and demand was completely suspended, there being a bountiful supply and absolutely no demand. There was no place to send the cotton, therefore it would be foolish to start to move it. There being no one to receive it, there was no place for it to go. Under such circumstances it was cruel mockery for people to talk of moving the cotton crop, except to move from the cotton field into the cotton house or warehouse. It was obvious that the cotton must be held by somebody, if gathered at all, to wait until the market should be opened. The question was, who should hold it? Should the producer suffer confiscation wholly or in part by parting with it for a trifle, not only forfeiting the profit of his labor, but failing to pay half of his debts, and leaving himself and family without the means to live, without credit for another year, and without the heart to produce another crop if he should unexpectedly be credited with the means? Such conditions render unnecessary the discussion of curtailing the next crop.

The impoverished condition of the toilers will curtail that, for unless some means are found to save them from ruin now they will not be able to produce another crop. If money were advanced to producers on their cotton in moderate amounts, something like as much as they would have to take for it if they sacrificed it, they could use the cotton as collateral, and holding it until conditions improve would reap the benefits of the inevitable advance when the markets reopen. If they are not aided in some way to hold it themselves so as to enjoy the benefit of restored prices, the cotton buyers and speculators will take it on their own terms and hold it until, by reopening of the markets, the price advances to a normal and honest rate, thereby making for themselves great gain. If they were all southerners and made the deal in their own right the wealth would remain in the South, although the producers would be robbed of the value of their cotton; if the buyers were all Americans trading in their own right people in the United States would still retain all the profit and our balance of trade would be maintained, though the South lost half the value of the cotton, and although the producers were financially ruined and carried down with them the merchants whom they owed, because not realizing on their cotton enough to pay them, and the merchants in turn not being able to discharge their obligations. But, unfortunately, these deals are not all made on American account. When the markets shall be reopened it will be found that most of this cotton bought by the factors at a sacrificial figure has been bought with foreign capital, and when it is shipped abroad the difference between 12 cents and 6 cents paid by the foreigners for our cotton will entirely wipe out the balance of trade and leave us a debtor nation, with the producers of cotton impoverished and helpless, and the southern supply merchants either bankrupt or so crippled as not to be able to help the producers to make another crop.

True, some people deny the extent of the disaster and even question the emergency itself, saying that in previous years the farmers have without ruin sold their cotton for lower prices than now prevail. Such persons forget that prices mean nothing except by comparison. The 5-cent cotton of past years was produced for somewhere about 5 cents; supplies to make the crop and to buy with the crop cost less than half they now cost; the debts contracted were less than half the debts due for producing the present crop. The producers really received more, by comparison with cost and debts, when the price was 5 cents than is possible now. The net result at the present confiscatory prices is on the minus side. The value of money can only be ascertained by what it will buy. Compared with cost of production or the debts of the producers owed therefor, this crop ought to bring 12 or 14 cents, while compared with current prices of cotton goods cotton ought to bring 18 or 20 cents.

With such horrible conditions harrowing our minds, it is not surprising that southern Congressmen were quick to comprehend the gravity of the situation and begin to exercise their wits and work night and day to discover and invoke means to prevent or mitigate impending calamity. The only thing more surprising than that is that the aforesaid newspapers and politicians were either too careless to discover or too reckless to acknowledge that the southern Congressmen, although not all agreeing as to method to secure relief, were feeling, talking, and acting just as I have described, bent on thrashing out the question and finding and applying relief if possible.

We knew, and the aforesaid newspapers and politicians knew, that the southern Members constituted but a small minority in the House and also a minority in the Senate. But we Members from the South had faith in the patriotism and liberality of our colleagues of the other sections. While the prospect of success was not bright, the situation was so desperate that we continued to work, hoping that light might break on the situation and that mayhap we might fall upon a plan which would commend itself to Congress and the administration. Some few of our colleagues, inconsiderately, we think, declined to support any of our plans and denounced as dishonest demagogues zealous Congressmen who, with whatever degree of hope, small or great, were earnestly striving to find some safe road to relief. But we began to hold meetings innumerable in the Senate Building, in the House Building, in committee rooms, in the Treasury, and at the White House. The farmers came here and pictured their desperate condition. We met with them and heard them repeat their true and terrible tale of woe, horrible now, and more terrible in prospect, to the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Reserve Board, all of whom heard with interest and sympathy, but declared they must act in this matter with their heads, not with their hearts. It may not be necessary, however, simply because they failed to give us encouragement, for us to conclude that their heads are weaker than their hearts. Numerous bills have been introduced, but no one of them has had the unanimous approval of even the southern Congressmen up to this time, neither has a single one of them met with the unanimous approval of the critics in the newspapers, political and otherwise, nor have all of them agreed on any practical suggestions which they could advise Congress to put through, although denouncing Congress for not acting and accusing Congressmen of violated promises to act.

In fact, long before any person outside of Congress suggested the possibility of Federal interference to avert disaster we had promptly taken up the subject. Although the exchange system was broken up, we thought if commodities could move from where they are to where they are not, and therefore needed worse, gold could also be transported in compensation, and we knew wherever gold could pass the possibility would soon be followed by a representative or substitute. All ships of belligerents having withdrawn from the traffic, we, believing that neutral ships could carry our supplies to all the ports of the Old World, promptly provided for a sufficient number of ships under the American flag to carry all of our products to Europe. The war-risk insurance being too great for private companies to handle, we provided for the Government to insure cargoes on all ships flying the American flag. While these measures will rapidly afford relief, it can not be done rapidly enough to save from ruin the producers of the cotton. It is impossible to meet and curb the exact difficulties of the case under our present system of finance. If the banks were disposed to vary their custom, which is not probable, and carry the cotton on loans to the farmers, who are not their direct customers, instead of the commercial people, who are their regular customers and need all the money they can get, and always get it, to buy the cotton while it is cheap—even then they would be unable to take care of the entire situation. So we were compelled to recognize that unless the Government, either through the banks or directly to the producers, advanced money, disaster could not be averted.

The bill referred to in the outset of my remarks reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19113) to enable owners of cotton produced by them or on their land to borrow money by depositing as security warehouse receipts issued for the period of the loan.

Be it enacted, etc., That any solvent national bank or State bank which shall, within 60 days from and after the passage of this act, lend to the owner of any cotton produced by himself or on his land by his cropper or tenant not more than three-fourths of the market value of said cotton at the time and place of the transaction, taking the borrower's note therefor, secured by the deposit of warehouse receipts for such cotton, with an insurance policy covering the value of the cotton for the period of the loan such note to mature one year after date and bear interest at the legal rate in the State in which the loan is made, may at any time before the maturity of such note deposit the note, cotton receipts, and insurance policy with the Treasury or any subtreasury of the United States and be refunded, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount of the money loaned: Provided, That when such note is finally paid the said bank shall receive as compensation for its services one-third of the interest collected, and the said bank shall indorse on such note and collateral its warranty that the papers are genuine and that the loan did not exceed three-fourths of the market price at the time and place of the loan. Beyond that the bank shall be held for no further liability, except to render the Treasury such assistance as may be called for in collecting and remitting when the note matures.

I never did tell anybody I could pass it, nor did I try to deceive anybody about it. I introduced it for the consideration of my colleagues. Nor did I even ask anybody to put it in a newspaper. I wrote it with a view of obviating objections urged against our plan in our conferences. The Secretary of the Treasury and the President had satisfied me that however good their disposition they were unable to afford adequate relief without legislation. They had opposed issuing bonds, and expressly to avoid issuing bonds had recommended the war-revenue bill. Many Congressmen had objected to a deposit of hundreds of millions of dollars, while others object to an additional note issue without increasing the gold reserve.

All the local business interests, including the banks, objected to unsettling business by lowering the rates of interest on loans made in the various States. And it seems to me that almost everybody objected to the valorization plan. If it were fixed too high, the Government would have to take it all; if fixed too low, it would result in holding down the price. So I conceived a plan of enabling the banks to do the business on certain specified conditions:

First. For a limited period of time lend to producers only.

Second. Observe the legal rate of interest at the place of the transaction.

Third. My bill would render necessary no sale of bonds nor issue of additional currency. If it were passed, we would find there was sufficient money afloat to meet all the demands, and that is a great advantage of my bill which does not seem to have been recognized by my colleagues. The truth is that when the system is started whereby money will be loaned on distress cotton the effect would be magical; confidence of the producers would be restored and the purchasers would recover from their panic, the price would rise, sales would occur, and the money loaned would be paid out on debts and returned to the bank and loaned on other cotton—so a much smaller amount would be required in the end than our people in their distress seem now to deem necessary.

Fourth. That they lend not exceeding three-fourths of the market value at the time and place of the transaction. Lending with regard to market value does not arbitrarily fix prices; but when it is known that three-fourths of the price can be borrowed on a bale of cotton many of the producers will refuse to sell, but prefer to borrow a portion of the price and hold their cotton for better prices. The effect would be that the purchasers would begin to compete for cotton and the price would advance. It would certainly never go any lower when it was known that the Government was prepared to lend to the producers so as to save them the necessity of selling at a sacrifice. The loan for 12 months would give the borrower a chance, and he could sell his cotton if the price advanced and pay off the loan before it was due. The banker making the loan could at any time before maturity of the note send his paper to the Treasury and be refunded his advance. It is analogous to the regional-bank system, and is the regular and natural way of doing business. The member bank carries his note with commercial collaterals to the regional bank and, less the discount, is refunded the money advanced. Under my bill the bank would use the Treasury instead of the regional bank. Under the regional-bank system the member bank would indorse the note; under my bill he would indorse the note only as far as necessary. The cotton ticket, being the best security in the world when the cotton is insured against loss, needs no further indorsement to make it the best gilt-edge security in the world than the guaranty that the deal is genuine and bona fide. But, in the face of a great crisis already upon us, I do not care to stickle for a particular bill.

I went into conference with the other representatives of the cotton States, and we agreed upon a bill, and I am bound by it—I always stand hitched. No man can win alone; only by united action can we hope to succeed. The revised Henry bill is entirely constitutional; there is nothing revolutionary about it; there is nothing unusual about it except the amount of money involved. The Government has in many instances before extended aid in cases no more meritorious, but smaller amounts were furnished. But, even if our scheme is a large one and the proposition unusual, Members should recollect that this is not an ordinary occasion; there is the greatest emergency upon us that has fallen upon the South, and through the South the entire country, except the Civil War, in the history of our Republic. Words can not exaggerate the existing suffering and the danger of greater calamity in the immediate future. When the producers are stricken down, all the superstructure of our system trembles if it does not fall. Members should abate some of their squeamishness in the face of this great disaster. There can be no danger to the Treasury, and Members are unnecessarily alarmed about the soundness of money and the credit of the country. If this Government never goes bankrupt until it does so by protecting the cotton producers, it will live to flourish for ages to come. The rock of its salvation financially is to take care of them.

There is so much paper money resting on so small a gold reserve nobody need "tear passion to tatters" about this proposition. The necessity and wisdom of a proper ratio of gold reserve to the paper money I do not care to discuss, but men are going a long way out of the sane and orderly path when they lie awake at night questioning the validity of any money now issued or hereafter ever to be issued by authority of the United States. There is another matter I wish to call attention to—the demand of the commercial side of the issue, curtailment of the next cotton crop—and some people responding to that demand have insisted that Congress by a prohibitive tax prevent overproduction of cotton next year.

I have always advocated and practiced that farmers should first provide for their own household by planting supply crops and raising live stock and devoting the remainder of their land and labor to raising cotton as a surplus crop, but I have never believed that it would operate permanently to reduce the crop. Intensive farming has satisfied us that our farmers could make just as much cotton on half the land they now plant and leave some margin of labor, fertilizer, and other expense to devote to supply crops. Our people during the Confederacy needed supplies, but they did not need cotton, as they could neither spin nor export it, and it might fall into the hands of the enemy and enable them to fight us more fiercely. If the Confederacy could have turned a large cotton crop into gold, they would have been glad to do so; but by legislation they curtailed the acreage so that the armies and the people could be supported and that the people would not waste time cultivating cotton for the enemy to capture.

At this time the farmers have not asked us for advice nor for the imposition of further burdens of taxation. If they wish to curtail the cotton acreage, they will find a way to do so. The State legislatures can do so, if they wish, under their police powers.

The cotton growers have asked us to provide money to take care of the distress cotton of this crop, not to manage their future business for them. Those who urge the excise tax to limit the production of cotton cite what they call several precedents. All are agreed that we may levy such a tax for the purpose of raising revenue, and the Constitution authorizes that only, but they say Congress imposed a tax on cotton once. That is true, but it was really for the purpose of raising revenue, but it was never sustained by a full bench, and was repealed because it was so odious. They further cite the tax on notes of State banks and oleomargarine. Those are unfortunate citations, and they are both abominable outrages, and I would rather repeal them than to commit another outrage. The first was passed to put State banks out of business and help the national-bank monopoly; the second was passed to put oleomargarine out of business and raise the price of dairy products.

As I understand the attitude of the courts, they leave Congress to say what the character of a bill is. If Congress deliberately promulgates a bill declared to be a revenue bill, the courts will take it for granted that Congress is telling the truth about it and hold it constitutional without interrogating the tax collectors as to the revenue produced or cross-examining Congressmen as to the integrity of their purpose in enacting it as a revenue bill. But if Congress should pass a bill levying a prohibitive tax on cotton with the purpose declared in the law that it was not to raise revenue and not expected to raise revenue, but to prevent the overproduction of cotton, no lawyer would contend that the Supreme Court would sustain such a bill as constitutional.

The proposition up to us now is to try to fool our consciences, fool the Supreme Court, and fool the people under the guise of a revenue bill by levying such a high tax on cotton that it would reduce production and raise no revenue. The majority in the Congresses which passed the oleomargarine law and the tax on State banks may or may not have known what the truth was, but it is certain they did not tell the truth, and the Supreme Court has never passed on the facts, but accepted the two acts as bona fide revenue measures. In this case, when we know that the purpose of a tax on cotton would not be for revenue, but to prevent overproduction, knowing that the Constitution prevents our voting for a tax bill not intended for revenue, we could hardly be expected to vote for such a bill. The newspapers and politicians who have criticized us are not even united in demanding that. In fact, many of them admit that it is not competent for us so to vote.

In a recent meeting of the governors of the cotton States here, several of the governors agreed with us, my own among the number, and my own governor favored curtailing the acreage, but not by Federal taxation. He favored the Henry bill, with proviso that borrowers should contract to reduce acreage. Very few of the Members of the House and Senate at this time would agree that under the Constitution they could honestly vote for such a tax bill. A few of them so believe, and I believe they are as honest as I am; they are just mistaken in their discrimination. They are as anxious to afford relief as I am, and this reference is not made to criticize them at all, but to set right before the country the true issue in that respect.

There is one thing that all Members representing the cotton States have practically united on, and we have tried now, and often before, to secure action on it—that is, the repeal or suspension of tax on State banks. If the State banks were free to issue their currency this crisis could have been easily met and disaster averted. That tax ought to be repealed regardless of other action in this crisis, but I appeal to all to sink all rigid notions of policy and eschew differences and criminations and recriminations. The bill agreed on in our conference of representatives of the cotton States has more support than any other proposition brought in; it would bring immediate relief if passed. It can be made to appl, the remedy immediately to the disease with instant effect. It is constitutional; it is rational; it is practical; it is the only thing the farmers have demanded, and I appeal to you, my colleagues, that we support that bill, and failing to pass that, then try some other. I for one decline to vote for adjournment or consent to a recess until we shall have either secured relief legislation or, by a fair opportunity to present the case and secure a vote on it, been finally and fairly defeated in our efforts. The cause is just, and I insist on consideration in this House.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, October 15, 1914.

(Legislative day of Thursday, October 8, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE COTTON SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I present a telegram, in the nature of a memorial, from the Texas State Senate, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

AUSTIN, TEX., October 14, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

W. V. HOWERTON,
Secretary of the Senate.

THE MERCHANT MARINE (S. DOC. NO. 601).

Mr. FLETCHER. I present a paper on the subject of our American merchant marine and ask to have it printed in the RECORD and made a public document. It is not very long.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

The Committee on the Merchant Marine of the House of Representatives in its report of September 8, 1914, on the Government ownership and operation of merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, said:

"We shall not discuss the desirability of having an American merchant marine. We will assume that there is no difference of opinion on that point."

No one can honestly take issue with that statement of the committee.

In order to establish an American merchant marine, the above committee, after full deliberation, favorably reported a bill authorizing the Government, acting through a shipping board composed of members of the Cabinet, under the direction of the President, to acquire and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, these vessels also to be available as naval auxiliaries.

There is an idea abroad that this bill is a war emergency measure. This is not so. In its report the committee says:

"The fact that we pay a sum variously estimated to be from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 annually to vessels under foreign flags, to transport our commerce, which seriously affects our balance of trade, is urged as a sufficient reason why we should have a merchant marine of our own; but this is only one of many reasons."

Long before the beginning of the present war the need for an American merchant marine was so keenly felt that the Senate passed a bill known as the Weeks bill, which proposed to use naval vessels as a nucleus for an American merchant marine.

Objections to the shipping bill now before Congress has developed from two sources. It was to be expected that there would be objection by shipping interests which have been reaping the benefit of American inactivity in the foreign shipping trade. It was also to be expected that certain financial interests and their affiliations, especially those interested in foreign shipping, would object to a Government merchant marine.

Opponents to the bill have advanced arguments to sustain their position, but not one of them will stand analysis. Many newspapers and periodicals are opposing the bill, but the fact that they enjoy considerable advertising and other patronage from the steamship lines and the financial interests that are opposing the bill may go far toward explaining their position on this great question of an American merchant marine.

(1) Opponents to the bill say that there are a large number of ships at present in American harbors unable to get cargoes; hence there is no need for a Government merchant marine.

A recent investigation has proven this not to be true. Ships seek cargoes at all times, but the present chartering market is very firm, and when the question of foreign credits is settled and commerce begins to move, as it must very shortly, there will be a positive famine in ships, as over 5,000,000 tons of German and Austrian shipping are completely out of commission, to say nothing of the large number of British, French, and Russian merchant ships which have been taken over by their respective Governments for transports and naval auxiliaries.

There are, all told, considerably less than 100 American ships in the foreign trade in the whole world, including all of the ships which have just taken American registry to secure the protection of the flag on account of the war. None of these ships are idle. Therefore, even though there were hundreds of idle ships in every American harbor, it would not alter the necessity for passing the shipping bill now before Congress, as all such ships would be foreign ships, and the object of this bill is to establish an American merchant marine.

(2) Opponents to the bill say that if the Government will not enter the shipping business private capital will provide an American merchant marine.

This is rather inconsistent with their statement that the harbors are full of idle ships, for if that is true private capital will find no attraction in the shipping business.

What likelihood is there to obtain private capital for this new business, especially to the amount contemplated by the shipping bill—$40,000,000—when long-established, going concerns find it impossible to obtain money except at heavy rates.

When the city of New York must pay 7 per cent, including bankers' commissions, for a loan of $100,000,000; when the State of Tennessee found it most difficult to obtain a loan of $1,400,000, it is quite certain that private capital will be unable to provide an American merchant marine, especially as it did nothing in the matter while the opportunity was open during the past 50 years.

(3) Opponents to the bill say that the Government will lose much money in this business.

This argument has been their favorite one. The bugaboo of increased taxes, "loss of the initial investment every three years," and much more of the same nature has been circulated in an effort to defeat the bill.

The shipping business is one of the most profitable in the world. Special Diplomatic and Consular Reports, page 39, says:

"The White Star Line in 1910 earned a net profit of £540,000 sterling on a capital of £750,000 sterling after writing off £370,016 sterling for depreciation. A dividend of 30 per cent was paid in that year."

The Holland Amerika Line earned about 50 per cent net on its capital during the first fiscal year of 1913. The Hamburg-American Line earned about 30 per cent net during its fiscal year of 1913. These are only a few specific instances of steamship-line earnings. They are not at all unusual, but are the regular thing in the shipping business.

F. E. Dixon & Co., of London, who own and operate a large fleet of "tramp" freighters, showed earnings of about 50 per cent net last year, which proves that steamship earnings are large in the irregular services as well as in the regular lines. In fact, the profits in the steamship business are so large that frequently the entire cost of a ship is earned in two years.

The question will arise, Why have not Americans gone into such profitable business? The answer is, For the same reason that Americans have neglected the vast foreign export trade—they have been too busy with their industries at home.

But, unlike the export trade, which each manufacturer can work up individually, to establish an adequate merchant marine is so large an undertaking at this time and involves so large an amount of money that, if it is to be done at all, it must be done by the Government.

(4) Opponents to the bill say that there will be danger of the United States violating neutrality if it operates merchant ships at this time.

The report of the Committee on the Merchant Marine says:

"We have rights as neutrals as well as duties to be observed. * * * The President will have the State Department to advise him on all questions affecting our rights and duties as neutrals. * * * We should assume that the President and shipping board, in the exercise of any powers granted or duties imposed by this bill, will keep well within our rights as neutrals."

On this point Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo also says:

"The board proposed in this bill consists really of the President of the United States and certain Cabinet officers therein mentioned. I think there is no more punctilious citizen of the United States with respect to the neutrality of this country than the President of the United States. I think you may safely depend on it, if this bill is passed and this board is vested with power to act, that that power will be exercised in such a way that the neutrality of this country will be preserved."

(5) Opponents to the bill make an alternative proposition that we should build up an American merchant marine by granting subsidies.

Subsidy seekers have managed to create a belief that the merchant marines of European countries, especially the merchant marines of the two greatest maritime countries in the world—Great Britain and Germany—have been built up by granting subsidies to its shipping. Neither of these countries grants subsidies except to a very limited extent and for very special service.

The Hamburg-American Line, the largest and perhaps the most successful steamship company in the world, has never received a subsidy. A moderate subsidy was granted by Great Britain to the Cunard Co. in connection with the steamers Mauretania and Lusitania, but that was chiefly to keep the Cunard Co. from selling out to the International Mercantile Marine, the combination organized by J. P. Morgan & Co. Over 90 per cent of the total tonnage of Great Britain does not receive a farthing of subsidy.

It will surprise many to know that the United States pays a larger subsidy to four American ships owned by the International Mercantile Marine, namely, the New York, Philadelphia, St. Paul, and St. Louis, than is paid by any foreign nation for similar service. This country pays to these ships an annual subsidy of about $735,000, and obtains practically nothing in return for this except the carrying of the mails on these steamers, which, at regular rates, would amount to only a trifling fraction of the amount of the subsidy. As a matter of fact, most of our mail goes forward on foreign ships, as they are much faster and they sail more frequently, the subsidized American ships being among the smallest and most out-of-date steamers in the North Atlantic trade.

The extraordinary large profits in the steamship business show that steamships can be operated profitably under the American flag without a subsidy, in spite of the somewhat higher wages and better living requirements of American seamen; therefore it will be well-nigh impossible to obtain a subsidy simply to make up the extra profits possible under foreign flags. For the same reason we will never have an American merchant marine unless it is established by the Government, because such private capital as may go into the foreign shipping business will operate under foreign flags to get the benefit of cheaper operation when the dangers of war are passed.

The present war has made it possible to secure, at most favorable prices, an excellent choice of modern, up-to-date steamers of different nationalities, also many steamers not yet out of the builders' hands, hence not yet nationalized, at less than the contract price. Also, as a result of the war, the financial success of the enterprise is more fully assured, as we will not have the competition of the warring nations to the same extent that we would have in times of peace.

The $40,000,000 called for by the shipping bill will not be an expense, as the bill's opponents are pleased to call it, but it will be an investment of the first class without considering the enormous advantage to the whole people of the United States in having an American merchant marine under Government control and the great reduction in rates that will be possible, as the Government will not desire net earnings of from 30 to 50 per cent on its investment, but will be content with only a fair return.

It would be little short of a political and economic crime if we did not avail ourselves of the present almost unbelievable opportunity to do in a most practical manner that which Congress was endeavoring to do before the commencement of the war as best it could by means of the Weeks bill.

THE COTTON CROP.

Mr. OVERMAN. I present a telegram, which I ask may be read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

AMERICUS, GA., October 14, 1914.

Senator OVERMAN,
Care United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We appreciate your loyalty to the cotton cause. Don't give up the ship, for our very existence depends on your doing something. Distressed property already being advertised for sale. Absolutely no market for cotton at any price. All business paralyzed. Express our appreciation to Senator SMITH.

TAYLOR LEWIS,
For Citizens of Southwest Georgia.

Mr. OVERMAN. I also send to the desk a letter. I will ask that the first paragraph of it be read, and that the balance of it appear in the RECORD. It is from a leading farmers' paper of the South.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as requested, and the entire letter is as follows:

RALEIGH, N. C. October 12, 1914.

DEAR SIR: It will be an irreparable blunder if Congress adjourns without doing something to insure adequate currency for lending farmers to hold cotton until conditions become normal. This is an emergency condition, and emergency conditions require emergency measures.

When the Salem, Mass., fire occurred did not Congress make an outright gift of $2,000,000 to its people? When the war came on did not Congress levy extra taxes in order to keep $75,000,000 in the national banks, and did not Leader UNDERWOOD declare the Government should have gone "to the rescue of these institutions whose solvency was jeopardized, not by any fault of their own but by the conditions coming from the war zone of Europe"?

Is it not equally true that the solvency of the southern farmers is now "jeopardized not by any fault of their own"? And while they ask no gift from Congress, they do ask that Congress help them to help themselves. They do ask that Congress provide sufficient currency at reasonable interest so they may borrow and carry the crop at their own risk and their own expense until conditions become normal again. President Wilson should not forget his own testimony against the "Money Trust" of New York, and should not forget that small southern banks can not take care of their ordinary obligations and carry this enormous burden of financing the cotton crop.

Cotton is already selling under 7 cents in Texas, and unless something is done before the millions of bales of distressed cotton go on the market November 1 can anyone say how much bankruptcy and disaster we shall witness?

President Wilson and Secretary McAdoo are great men, but Congress is responsible not to them but to the people. It should never adjourn without providing, not a gift but sufficient currency, which Secretary McAdoo declared would be available for "carrying the crop till a reasonable market can be found," but which present banking conditions do not provide.

Very truly, yours, THE PROGRESSIVE FARMER.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a proposed amendment to the pending emergency revenue bill. I wish to say, however, that I heartily indorse the amendment introduced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. The South does not come here as a mendicant asking alms, but they are asking justice. They are asking the credit of the Government, and they will take care and pay back to the Government every cent advanced. In the event the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is not adopted I shall propose the following amendment, which I ask to have read to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. OVERMAN to the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, viz: Insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit and pay to each State a sum equal to the collections made from the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia, or from any citizens or inhabitants thereof, or other persons, companies, corporations, or associations under act of Congress, approved July 1, 1862, and the amendatory acts thereto, for the purpose of aiding said States in assisting the producers of cotton in taking care of their surplus crop, which they are unable to sell by reason of the European war; to be used for the purchase of cotton by said States from the producers thereof, or making loans to the producers of said cotton under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, Attorney General, and the governor of each of said States.

"SEC. 2. That the following sum shall be paid to each State, the same being the amount found upon the books of the Treasury of the United States as the amount collected from each of said States under said act: To the State of Alabama, $10,388,072.10; Arkansas, $2,555,638.43; Florida, $918,944.98; Georgia, $11,897,094.98; Kentucky, $553,527.45; Louisiana, $10,098,501; Maryland, $51,349.52; Mississippi, $8,742,995.93; Missouri, $592,098.36; North Carolina, $1,959,704.87; South Carolina, $4,172,420.16; Tennessee, $7,873,460.71; Texas, $5,502,401.24; Virginia, $657,588.58.

"SEC. 3. That said sum paid over to said States may be held for a term of five years subject to such disposition as Congress may hereafter provide.

"SEC. 4. That there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $65,963,598.31 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 5. That when loaned to the producers of cotton, the rate of interest on said sum shall not exceed 3 per cent per annum."

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to say that a direct tax was levied upon the cotton of the South by an act passed in 1862 during the Civil War and a tax of $3 a bale on cotton collected in 1865–1868, when we were in a condition worse than the Belgians are to-day. All we ask is that this money be loaned to the South on this same product to take care of it in our present distressed condition.

PROPOSED LOAN ON CEREALS.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], which I ask may be read and ordered printed.

The amendment was read and ordered to be printed, as follows:

Provided further, That whenever the price of No. 1 northern wheat at the principal terminal markets in the United States shall fall below $1.10 per bushel; and whenever No. 1 barley shall fall below 65 cents per bushel; and whenever No. 1 white oats shall fall below 50 cents per bushel at such markets, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase all of said grains offered for sale, at said prices, and to also purchase all other lower grades at such reduced prices as are generally recognized by commercial usage as the proper difference in value of such lower grades in the purchase and sale of grains.

It shall be the duty of the said Secretary of the Treasury to store and hold said grain so purchased until it can be resold at a profit of 2 cents per bushel.

To prevent the value of such grains falling below the aforesaid prices, the said Secretary of the Treasury shall prohibit all importations of such grains. If by reason of scarcity of production the price of any of the said grains shall rise above the price authorized to be paid, the said Secretary of the Treasury shall then allow importations until such prices shall have reached the standard of the purchasing prices herein mentioned.

The sum of $500,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to meet the expenses of this provision.

To secure the necessary funds to carry out this purchasing project, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds of the United States, bearing 4 per cent interest, in such denominations as he may determine, and due five years from the date of issue; said bonds shall not be sold for less than par.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is it the Senator desires?

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will be patient, I will tell him in a moment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will be patient. I want the regular order to be proceeded with, but I will yield to the Senator if it takes only a short time.

Mr. GRONNA. I present a letter from the Farmers' Grain Dealers' Association of North Dakota, protesting against the provision in the pending revenue bill taxing grain.

I wish to say in this connection that I have conferred with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and, as I understand it, there will be an amendment offered which will change the provision as it is now in the bill. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to have the letter read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator desire the letter read or will he be content to have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. GRONNA. It is very brief. It consists of only a few lines.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well; I will not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

PEKIN, N. DAK., October 10, 1914.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GRONNA: My attention has been called to pages 22 and 23 of the revenue bill, which is now pending in Congress, wherein it proposes to tax grain sent from the farmers' elevator companies to the terminal market, also an equal tax if the grain is hedged. It may be useless or needless to file with you a protest against this measure, and you being a farmer, will certainly realize what this means to a grain-producing State like North Dakota, and, further, the equal injustice to the consumer. We therefore hope that you place every means in your power to have the proposed tax on grain set aside.

With personal regard, I beg to remain,

Yours, very truly,
FARMERS' GRAIN DEALERS' ASSOCIATION OF NORTH DAKOTA,
P. A. LEE, President.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LA JUNTA, COLO.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, there is a bill which has passed the House of Representatives and been referred to the committee of the Senate and approved by the committee and is on the calendar. It is somewhat of an emergency measure. The amount of $75,000 was appropriated for a public building at La Junta, Colo. The citizens contributed a site for it to the value of $20,000. The department advertised for bids, and the bids were $9,000 in excess of the amount which was appropriated. They are waiting to see whether they will accept that bid, which is a low bid, they say. This bill is for the purpose of making an additional appropriation of $10,000. It seems to me that inasmuch as the town has contributed $20,000 for the site the bill ought to be passed. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12665) to increase the limit of cost of a public building at La Junta, Colo.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not object, but I wish to say to the Senate that while I do not object to this I shall object to any further unanimous consent, and I shall ask for the regular order after this bill is disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at La Junta, Colo., be, and the same is hereby, increased $10,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, in bringing to the attention of the Senate the amendment to the tax bill which I offered on yesterday I wish to call attention to the fact that it is in no sense a political measure. I ask for it the consideration of Members on the other side of the aisle equally with those upon this side, and I hope to receive support from Members on the other side of the aisle equally with Members upon this side of the aisle.

I will be able to show that it is not simply a local question that is involved, but a national question. I will be able to furnish the best of authority to show that it is an international question and that it concerns the manufacturer and his interests almost equally with the producer of the unmanufactured staple. I contend that it is a problem which concerns the general welfare of the entire country.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to say, in connection with presenting this amendment, that those of us who present it to the Senate are not wedded to it in its exact terms. We are ready to accept criticism and to make modifications, if modification is deemed advisable. I expect to bring facts to the attention of the Senate which will show that this is a problem which concerns the general welfare of this country in its broadest sense. While it immediately concerns something over 12,000,000 white citizens and 6,000,000 colored citizens, it reaches beyond the producers; it concerns the welfare of all of the manufacturers of lint cotton in the United States. It goes beyond them; it concerns the business of the citizens of New England, of New York, of New Jersey, of Pennsylvania, of Ohio, of Wisconsin, of Indiana, of Illinois, and of Michigan. I shall bring to the attention of the Senate how deeply it concerns their commerce, and how directly many of their citizens to-day are involved in the handling of this product.

I shall go further and call attention to the international side of this question and to the manner in which it peculiarly concerns our international situation as well as the manufacture of this product as an international product.

The States that produce lint cotton, Mr. President—and it is distinctly an American monopoly, for the character of cotton which we produce, so necessary to the manufacturer of clothing for the world, can not be produced elsewhere—the States which produce it, naming them in the order of the quantity produced by each, are Texas, Georgia, Alabama, South Carolina, Mississippi, Arkansas, Oklahoma, North Carolina, Louisiana, and Tennessee. Texas last year produced 3,905,000 bales; Tennessee produced 379,000 bales. I shall not stop to give the number of bales produced by each of the other States. Missouri, Florida, and Virginia also produced cotton, and States other than those before named and these three together produced 32,500 bales.

I wish, first, to call attention to some of the peculiarities of the product and of the marketing of the product. Of the 18,000,000 and more people who live in nine of these States, two-thirds of them are engaged in agriculture; and it is safe to say that over 10,000,000 depend directly upon the product of their cotton for their livelihood. Of that number I should say 6,000,000 were whites and 4,000,000 negroes.

Cotton is peculiar as an agricultural product in that the person producing it can do nothing with it but sell it. It is not like other agricultural products, something which can at least be partly consumed by the producer. It can not be manufactured at home. It must be sold, or it is useless to the producer.

Under the plan of production a large sum of money is spent from February until September to produce the crop, and then during the months of September and October it is harvested, money also being spent in connection with the harvest. When the crop is finally ready for market, it is at once sold, according to all past practice, at least the great bulk of it is sold, and the liabilities incurred in connection with production are met.

The resources of the banks, the resources of the merchants, the resources of the farmer are exhausted in the production of the crop, and they all rely upon the crop when it comes upon the market to pay up their obligations. Those obligations reach all over the United States, into the West, into the Middle West, into the North, and into the East.

Last year the crop was worth a billion dollars. Ninety days ago there was every reason to believe that the crop of this year would be worth a billion dollars and that to-day the money of England and of other foreign countries would be pouring into the South, into these States, buying the crop and furnishing the resources to settle the obligations of that section to the other States of the Nation. We understand what has caused the change. The last of July war broke out.

A large part of these farmers, especially the negroes, have little resources. They depend absolutely, to live, upon what their cotton sells for. They have gone on credit as long as they can. Their livelihood during the coming winter depends upon the surplus which comes from the cotton. This is not limited to the negro; a large number of white farmers depend absolutely, for a living and for their opportunity to go through the winter, on the sale of their cotton, and the very strongest of the farmers and planters depend upon the disposal of their cotton to meet their liabilities. This is the day, October 15, that about one-half their liabilities mature, and from now on for the next 30 days they mature continually. It is upon this crop that the liabilities depend, both that the debtor may settle and the creditor may have something. The merchants all through this section depend also upon the crop to meet their liabilities to the larger merchants and the manufacturers of the Eastern and Middle States. The bankers depend upon it for the settlement of their notes maturing to-day and within the next 30 days, to settle their liabilities to bankers from Boston to Chicago, and farther on west, in St. Louis and Kansas City. The whole business fabric of this section rests for its conduct upon a market for this crop. It is all sold at about this time each year, according to past experience. I say "all"; I mean, practically all.

Let me again emphasize the distinction that should be drawn between cotton and other agricultural products. The farmer raises his corn or his wheat, and he lives off of it; he feeds his stock and his cattle off of it, and he can continue to live off of it without selling it; but the cotton producer can receive nothing from his cotton until he sells it. He can get nothing out of it to support his family until he sells it.

Mr. President and Senators, 60 per cent of this crop is shipped abroad each year under normal conditions. I have here a list of the countries to which it goes, or to which it went last year. These figures refer to bales of 500 pounds each.

Great Britain took 3,281,000 bales, and manufactured that quantity.

Germany manufactured 1,258,000 bales.

Russia, 376,000 bales.

France, 787,000 bales.

Austria, 626,000 bales.

Belgium, 171,000.

Over half of this crop last year was manufactured by the countries now in war. The cotton product sold abroad last year brought $610,000,000, which went into the commerce of our country to give it vigor and force. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] stated a few weeks ago that as a manufacturer it was to his interest that cotton should bring a good price; that it was vastly more important to the manufacturers of New England that this $610,000,000 should be the price of our cotton sold abroad, to give force and power to the commerce of our entire country, than that he should save a few cents per pound in the purchase and the country should be the weaker as a whole as a result of the lower price of the raw material. Upon the floor of the Senate the senior Senator from Rhode Island made substantially that statement only a few weeks ago.

Let me call your attention to another fact. Last year, during the months of August and September, we exported 1,187,500 bales of cotton. During the past two months we exported 146,000 bales of cotton.

During the past five years cotton has sold for an average of 12.74 cents per pound. During the past 10 years it has averaged about 12 cents per pound. Now what is the situation? Sixty per cent of the market has been practically withdrawn and absolute paralysis of the trade in lint cotton has followed. It is not a case of overproduction; it is a normal production. It is the European war that has paralyzed the industry. For 10 years the price of cotton has averaged nearly 12 cents a pound, for the past 5 years 12¾ cents a pound, and now what is it? There is no price.

A few weeks ago I expressed the fear that the price would drop to 6 cents a pound. I expressed it upon the floor of the Senate, and I was assured by many that my fear was ungrounded. You can not sell it at 6 cents a pound to-day if you put it on the market in any quantity. It has sold as low as 4 cents a pound and 3 cents a pound. The bankers can not loan on it. They do not know what it is going to sell for.

I recognize the fact that my burden would be heavy were I claiming that the Government should stand behind the producer of crops and protect him in normal conditions. This, however, is an unprecedented condition. It never has happened before. It is my earnest prayer that the conditions abroad never may happen again. There is no precedent for this situation in the cotton trade. I pray there never may be one again.

I have here letters that assure me that cotton has been taken into the smaller towns in my State and in Texas, and they have not been able to get a bid on it. It has sold at places, in small quantities, as low as 3 cents a pound. It is quoted now at 6 cents a pound, but very few sales are made. If you should undertake to market the crop as it normally should be marketed, you could not sell it at all.

Senators, what will be the consequence if nothing is done? It has cost in the neighborhood of 10 cents a pound to produce it. On the most economical basis next year it will cost 8 cents a pound. It can not be produced at less, on the average. There are places and men of special skill who will raise it for less; but with the character of labor which we must use for much of the production, the average cost can not be brought to less than about 8 cents a pound; and if I made that statement in the South I would be at once called to account for the statement, with the declaration that I had underestimated the cost 2 cents a pound.

It is a product that time does not injure. Cotton fairly well stored, kept out of rain, is as good 50 years after it is picked as it is the day it is picked. Moths do not injure. Weevils do not consume it. There is no animal or insect, after it is picked, that touches it to injure it. There is no other agricultural product which can be cared for with the simple ease that cotton can be cared for and which, like cotton, never deteriorates as the result of age.

The world must be clothed out of our American cotton. It is one of our greatest national assets. The world must have it a short time hence to clothe the people of the world. Is this industry now to be destroyed?

I said that the manufacturer suffered. I read from the greatest authority in the world on this subject. Sir Charles W. Macara, president of the International Federation of Master Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Association, in a letter of August 31, stated:

> The purpose of this letter is to confirm to you the statement made by our secretary on Saturday that it would be a great calamity if, owing to the European war, the cotton farmers of the United States of America were ruined. Their ruin will certainly be brought about unless steps are taken by the Government of the United States of America, in combination with large financial houses, to hold back several million bales of cotton. It must be borne in mind that if the war lasts longer than the end of this year there will be a surplus of American cotton of some 5,000,000 bales, and this must necessarily have a depreciating effect on the price of American cotton, and the producer will necessarily be the greatest sufferer in the end. It is neither to the interests of the cotton spinners of the world nor to that of the United States of America as a nation that the price of cotton be reduced to such a low level as, say, 6 or 8 cents.

He wrote that the last day of August. Cotton is down to 6 cents, and it has still no stable demand. There is no bottom. Wiped out will be our balances from abroad if they absorb the cotton at this price. Wiped out will be one-half of the farmers of the South, white as well as black, who cultivate cotton. It will not pay their debts. Many a small farmer will find that the balance of his debts for which he has mortgaged his little farm, or mortgaged, with a homestead waiver, his stock, after his cotton is sold will wipe out all he has and leave him almost with starvation confronting him during the coming winter. A serious part of this problem is, What will this great child race of negroes that is on us do, and what will we do with them? What menace will they become?

Again, the president of the International Spinners and Manufacturers declares that the whole trade in the manufacture of cotton has been demoralized by the demoralization in the price of the raw material. Put down, as it is, to a price far below the cost of production, it is known that the price is temporary.

The raw material put upon a basis of fluctuation as to selling price leaves the consumer of the manufactured product where he does not know what to give. The merchant who would buy the output of a mill finds his trade in chaos and is unable to move it. The best authority from the spinners and manufacturers is that their trade is paralyzed by this condition of the trade in the raw material.

So I extend it from a problem of the 18,000,000 planters or cotton producers to the broader trade of the entire country, extending to the manufacturers and to the merchants who handle the manufactured product.

But let us go a little further. Let me take the State of Michigan. That State ships into the South thousands of automobiles. All over the South there are offices rented and forces employed by the manufacturers of Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, New York, Pennsylvania, and other States engaged in the sale of this one product. In the city of Atlanta, where I live, there are more than 100 agents. I was there a week ago, and I was told by them that every sale had stopped and that they would be compelled to discharge every employee with whom they did not have a yearly contract. It means failure, bankruptcy, for one-half of the producers; and then, a little later, it will mean the same thing for merchants and bankers, and will reach into the pockets of the whole country.

The papers of Wisconsin declare that trade in their cheese products is paralyzed because the South, their great customer, no longer buys.

I present it as a national problem. I present it as a problem which concerns the general welfare of the entire country.

I was urged by our producers of naval stores to seek to do something for them. I replied: "Yours is not a problem involving the welfare of the entire country. Yours is a personal problem of a number of good men in a few States. It is not a great national problem; yours is not in the same class as the cotton problem, and I can not endeavor to do for you what you have in mind."

The New York Herald of yesterday states that—

> There was no improvement in the character of spot news from the South. While it is obvious that farmers are holding the bulk of their crops, such cotton as is forced for sale finds comparatively few buyers, and prices appear to be steadily working lower. They have already reached a level far below the most conservative estimate of the cost of production, and so far as can be learned domestic mills are still buying only for their more immediate needs.

Local spot handlers said yesterday that their offers were anywhere from one-eighth to one-fourth cent lower than on Friday morning, and it was reported that strict middling cotton was being offered from Norfolk delivered at New England mill points at 7⅞ cents.

It is lower now. That price of 6 cents has only been maintained because of the refusal of the farmer to sell; by the fact that it is piled up around the farmer's house and he declines to take it to town.

I have letters, a few extracts from which I desire to read; first, a telegram from a man interested in a number of banks:

Cotton selling in many towns now in Georgia from 4 to 6 cents today. No buyers in many towns at 6 cents.

Now I will read from a careful student of the question residing in Georgia. His letter reached me this morning:

It is impossible for any demand under the present situation to take care of the distress cotton. The cheaper the cotton the more distress cotton will be thrown on the market. While the crop has been made at any approximate cost of 10 cents per pound, the larger part of this cost, and in many instances all of the cost, has already been advanced. These advances are now becoming due, and while our merchants, bankers, fertilizer people, and other mediums of credit are willing to forbear collections and further extend credit, and would do so if cotton had any stable value, they are becoming demoralized and frightened by the rapidly falling price of cotton. This panicky and hysterical situation is forcing more and more cotton on the market, and further depressing the price and value of cotton as security for credit.

If this condition continues, it will result in a series of bankruptcies, foreclosures, forced sales—not only of cotton but of all other tangible assets on the market without purchasers and without money to buy—and will ultimately lead to such paralysis of all business and enterprise in the cotton belt of the South as to render this section unable to carry on practically any kind of farming operations next year, and, in my opinion, the cotton acreage, as well as all other agricultural acreage in the South for 1915, will be far more radically reduced than by any suggested or contemplated legislation which has been made, either National or State. The ultimate results from such experience will destroy far more values in the South than the entire cotton crop even in a normal year.

To what extent these losses will fall upon other sections of our country I can not tell. But necessarily the East and West, who are large creditors of the South, will bear their respective portions of the losses. Ultimately the cotton mill industries of this country, as well as of other countries, will appreciably feel and sustain these losses, for if the South's ability to carry on farming operations is unduly crippled or destroyed and cotton production is abnormally reduced the result will necessarily be high-priced cotton, probably, next fall, and then the cotton mills will themselves go through another period of disastrous financial operations.

I read from another letter from a legislator residing in middle Georgia. His letter also reached me this morning:

To-day cotton in Macon is selling at 6¼ cents, and no demand. I learn that farmers in Macon and in Danville on Saturday sold good cotton at 4½ and 4⅝ cents. If the cotton crop continues to be sold at this price and at much lower prices, to which it will inevitably go unless the Government comes to the assistance of the staple, the result will be that 15,000,000 bales of cotton, which is intrinsically worth $900,000,000, will be sold for $450,000,000, which means a loss in gold to America of $450,000,000—more than the cost of the Panama Canal.

And, mark you, this loss does not fall upon the southern cotton farmer alone, because out of that money the State of Georgia buys from the East and West $175,000,000 of foodstuffs.

I saw in the National Packer a few days since a quotation from some market in Wisconsin to the effect that the cheese market was very dull, and had gone off in value on account of the lack of southern demand.

Just think for a moment how a loss of the purchasing power to the South of $450,000,000 in this year's crop will affect the producers of those commodities, which have been sold to the South for years.

Think also how it will affect the South's purchasing power for next year and the year after that.

The solution of this question, in my opinion, is easy, provided the northern, eastern, and western Senators and Members of Congress can see and know that if the cotton crop is sacrificed, as it evidently will be, that the calamity is much more of a calamity of the North and East than it is of the South.

Mr. President, the assessed value of nine of these Southern States chiefly interested in cotton raising for 1912 was $6,827,800,000. I say to you without a moment's hesitation, without a doubt, that unless something is done to meet this great emergency those values will be reduced by next year 25 per cent. This is a conservative estimate. It is not simply the loss of the cotton crop; it is a blow to the entire section, a great part of our country.

Ah, gentlemen, I speak of a part of the country which our brethren of the North insisted should remain in the Union, and for which their splendid boys fought under the Stars and Stripes, and whose splendid service in keeping the South in the Union we so often hear about with admiration, and to whom we have paid $4,500,000,000 in pensions for keeping these States of the South in the Union. Now, if we were worth so much to the Union, if it was so desirable that we should stay in the Union—and I am glad we are in it; do not misunderstand me for a moment on that subject—if we were worth so much, is it not worth something to save these States to-day?

But it is not simply saving the South; it is saving the commerce of the country. I see my friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I say to him that the greatest manufacturing industry perhaps in his State will be jarred unless we can do something to save this condition in the South. Michigan sells by far more automobiles in the South than any other State in the Union. Their agents have places of business all over the South. They are not selling a machine now, and they can not collect the debts that are due them, and if this condition goes on, foreclosures will not collect debts.

It is a war situation, and it is a situation as distressing and as serious as has ever been brought on by a flood in Ohio or a fire in Salem, Mass., or an earthquake at Charleston or an earthquake at San Francisco. The Treasury has been freely used in such emergencies. It is as serious to 5,000,000 people as was the condition of our 50,000 who were abroad a short time ago and who wanted to get home. We furnished $2,500,000 to bring these travelers home. May we not loan the credit of the Government to save those who "stayed by the stuff"?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Will the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to interrupt the Senator in the course of his presentation of this matter, but if he would prefer it, before he closes I wish to ask some questions in regard to a practical feature of it as a matter of legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will come to that a little later on. I am seeking first to present the broad question to the Senate as I see it. I know there are Democrats who have a narrower view of our governmental power than I have. I believe in the power of the Government, the right and duty of the Government, as occasion requires, if it makes really a case of general welfare, to use its power not to interfere with the rights of a citizen where the special delegation of authority has not been given, not to interfere with the rights of a State where the special designation of power has not been given; but without interfering with the right of either to come to the help in the interest of the general welfare of the people of the country.

We spent $400,000,000 on the Panama Canal. The commerce of our country involved in this question involves more for the next 5 years than the Panama Canal will contribute in 50 years, and the Panama Canal is a continuing burden. We come to you with a proposition which involves not one dollar of burden upon the National Government.

Now, Mr. President, I might go into details to show how the commerce of New York City, how the commerce of Boston, how the commerce of all the New England States is affected by this problem.

I stop a moment to say that I understand all over my State orders to New England for shoes have been suspended or canceled within the past 60 days. I met the representative of a large New England manufacturing house engaged in the manufacture of shoes and was told that he was going home, that nobody would buy anything. Why should they, with the certainty that they had nothing as things stood to pay with, and why should the manufacturers want to sell?

Mr. President, the plan which we present is not intricate. It is conceded that we have at least a surplus of 5,000,000 bales which will not be consumed by the mills next year. I think it will hardly be questioned that within the next two or three years the world will need this cotton. It will need vastly more than this cotton if the agricultural paralysis takes place in those States next year which is in front of them, because little will be produced.

This bill proposed no issue of paper money to burden the Treasury to be maintained by additional gold reserve. It proposes no inflation of the currency. It proposes the issue of $250,000,000 of 4 per cent bonds due on or before three years from date, issued in small denominations of $10 up. It proposes that these bonds shall not be sold upon the market, but shall be exchanged for cotton in the States in proportion, as far as possible, as the States have produced cotton.

It proposes that this cotton shall be taken off the market during the next year, with, however, the privilege that a board consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Agriculture, if the manufacturers should consume the crop offered for sale and need part of the 5,000,000 bales may let them have it.

It proposes that in 1916 again cotton shall be sold from these 5,000,000 bales as the demand calls for it, and that not later than July 1, 1917, all of it shall be sold.

It proposes to levy a tax as an excise tax on the cotton producers, beginning with half a cent in 1916 and a cent a pound in 1917 to meet the deficit, if there be any deficit, on the sale of this cotton by the Government. One per cent a pound on a normal crop will be $75,000,000. If the crop is reduced, of course the price of the 5,000,000 bales will become normal, which is between 12 and 13 cents. If the crop is reduced, the 5,000,000 bales would easily sell for more than enough to pay the bonds, interest on them, and the expense of handling the cotton. If it does not pay it, though, 1 cent a pound on a 10,000,000-bale crop would be $50,000,000.

We are not here as mendicants; we are not here seeking to reach our hands into the National Treasury and take care of ourselves from the taxes paid by others. We are proposing to carry our own burden finally. We are proposing to free the Government and the people of the entire country from the loss of a dollar as a result of the aid which will carry us through this great crisis, and enable us to settle our debts to our northern and eastern and western friends, and tide over this war condition until things are normal, and then pay back every dollar through the industry itself, if there is a dollar which it costs the Government to help us do it.

One clause of the amendment provides for a tax next year of 2 cents a pound on all the cotton produced in excess of one-half this year's crop. I do not think that will raise much revenue, because I do not believe that next year's crop will exceed one-half this year's crop; but the following year, 1916, we propose to put a half cent a pound on all cotton produced to meet the interest and expenses of caring for the cotton, and the year following a cent a pound, if any loss exists, and to continue a cent a pound each year until every loss is met. I repeat, a cent a pound on this year's crop would produce $75,000,000.

Senators, I do not know that we have found the solution of this question, but I do ask you to forbear before you reach an adverse conclusion. Stop to think about it; give us the benefit of a consideration; and may I say, quoting from an editorial in a newspaper that I read a few days ago, I believe that the best legislation comes from a combination of heart and head? I do not believe that the wisest mode of handling a great problem which concerns the people of this country is to eliminate all heart; I believe, finally, in the action of the judgment, and I beg you do not at once precipitate an adverse conclusion. Confer with us; think about it; help find what can be done. If we have not the right plan, help us find one.

The welfare of our whole country is involved; the welfare of your citizens is involved; our trade relations abroad are involved; our obligations to other sections of the country—your sections—are involved. Help us study out what is best, if we have not found it. We wanted to find a plan that would place no burden on the Treasury; we wanted to find a plan by which we could come before you and say, "We will carry our own burdens if you will allow us the benefit of the Government's credit and cooperation in this way for two or three years"; but if there is a better way, if there is some objection to this plan, if there is a better plan, help us find it. Do not, sir, simply with the idea that you are going to fight what we have suggested, put yourselves in the frame of combating any and all action. See it, I beg you, in its broad light. Take a little while to think about it before you reach a conclusion. Do not spring to immediate opposition.

During the present session of Congress we have voted $35,000,000 in money to build railroads in Alaska, and we put into that bill a provision that anything that comes from the mines shall stay in Alaska. Is that for the general welfare? That is to develop Alaska, to make it possible for people to go there. If there is a loss, we all bear it; if there is a gain, Alaska gets it. Our cotton plan is one by which, if there is a loss, cotton bears it; if there is a gain, the Government gets it. We are asking you to help save some people who are already on the soil and tilling it.

We voted two and a half million dollars to bring back travelers from abroad. We are asking you to take care of some people who stayed by the stuff. We have voted nearly $80,000,000 for reclamation purposes in the West; we indorsed $120,000,000 of bonds to build railroads in the West. I am not objecting to it.

We have spent $600,000,000 on the Philippines that we are going to give up as soon as we sufficiently civilize the Filipinos to enable them to take care of their own affairs—a broad philanthropy.

We, 18,000,000 of your own people, come and ask cooperation to handle the severest blow that has fallen on any section of this country since the Civil War.

Senators, do not strike before you think; do not oppose before you have time for the calmest consideration of the subject. While you are objecting to what we suggest, try to think of something better. I ask for mental operation, lit up by the light of kindly hearts.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer upon this subject now. I thank Senators for their attention.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, while I think that most of us who have been here more than half a dozen years have realized the rapidity with which we, through our legislation, are being driven into the field of paternalism, I do not think there is anyone in the Senate who has not been astounded by the mighty advance in that direction which is proposed in the pending amendment, which is that the Government shall proceed, whenever any one of the industries of the people becomes unprofitable, to make it profitable; and if there is not sufficient demand for the product that the Government shall purchase that product and hold it out of the market until it reaches a profitable price.

Mr. President, much as I am opposed to paternalism, great as is my antagonism for socialism, I must say that if we are going to take a step of this kind, let us be fair with every one of our people and every one of our industries and go into the socialistic ford heart and soul; let us raise the banner of paternalism, conduct everything by the Government, and let the citizen be the servant of the Government, to receive compensation for his wages according to standards fixed by the Government. That is what this measure finally leads to.

I do not agree with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] when he says that the Senators on his side of the Chamber, especially those from the South, take too limited view of the authority of the General Government. I have never known them to take such a limited view whenever the question was one of appropriation or one which could help out their particular section of this country. They have taken that view only, it seems to me, when it operated as a good argument to defeat some measure which they desired to defeat.

The Senator has not given us all the information that we ought to have in order to determine whether or not the southern section of this country is in the dire straits which he has depicted. I have read this morning a statement showing that for the last year there has been no other section of the country so prosperous as the southern section. There has been none so unprosperous as my own section during the same time.

I do not know what you mean by "a normal cotton crop," but my understanding is that your cotton crop is considerably in excess of normal this year and considerably in excess of what the average has been for the last 10 years. If I am in error in that, of course I can be corrected.

We have always found in the case of our agricultural products that whenever we had a little more than the normal crop our prices went down very much indeed. We have taken that as a matter of course, and have assumed that we have had to deal with that condition ourselves; but you have helped to make our condition still worse by providing that whenever we have a short crop that will lift our prices up so that we can barely make a living, you will allow the Canadian surplus and the Argentine surplus to be thrown in upon our country and thereby drive our prices down.

I have been told again and again by southern Members that if they were sure of securing 10 cents a pound for their cotton they could make good money, and that if they could get 12 cents they would be exceedingly prosperous.

Now, if I may call the Senator's attention to conditions in our section of the country—and we have never asked for any Government support—if you receive 8 cents a pound for your cotton, you are getting a better price, measured by the cost of production, than we are getting to-day for our northern cereal products. In my State to-day, in spite of the European war, which is said to raise the prices of products, our oats are only bringing about 37 cents a bushel, and barley in the interior part of the State is worth only 35 cents a bushel. Our cereal crop this year is short, and we should receive greater prices per bushel, but we are not securing those better prices because of foreign importations.

You can not hire your help and raise a bushel of barley for 60 cents a bushel; you can not hire your help and raise a bushel of oats for 40 cents a bushel. We are getting about 70 cents a bushel for our wheat in North Dakota. You can not hire your help and raise that wheat and make a profit at 90 cents a bushel. We have been able to live only because we put our labor in at nothing. We, of course, get our board, such as it is, and the little clothing we wear, but in order to make both ends meet we can not allow ourselves wages, and yet we have not called upon the Government to give us assistance.

Let me call the Senator's attention to the condition in 1894 and 1895. Why, Mr. President, the Senator has stated that in the case of grain the farmer can live off of it in some way, but that he can not live off of his cotton. Well, perhaps during the Stone Age, or along during the age of the cave man, humanity was possessed of molars capable of grinding grain. In the twentieth century we can not do that; we have got to sell our wheat and buy flour; and, although the Senator from Georgia thinks that we can eat the raw wheat and raw corn, I want to assure him that they would be very indigestible, and I doubt if the teeth of the people of the present century would allow them to live in that manner.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question really for information?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will ask the Senator, have you not local mills in the neighborhood to grind your local wheat?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the old toll mill is a thing of the past. You sell your wheat and you buy flour.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My reason for asking the question was that, when I was a boy in western North Carolina, I have driven a good many loads of wheat to the mill, had it ground, left my toll, and brought my flour home. I supposed that some such condition still exists.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I also did that when I was a boy; but the Senator and I both know that the world has taken several strides since we were boys.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know that; but still I thought there was a local mill.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not doing business along that line; and I doubt if it is even doing business in the South along that line.

Now, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact, when he says that they can not do anything with the cotton, that in 1895 the people of Kansas had to burn their corn to keep warm. They absolutely could not get anything for it; they used it for firewood. Kansas did not come to the Government and ask that it support the State of Kansas, and that it buy corn at 40 or 50 cents a bushel and hold it. In 1895 I sold a great many bushels of oats at 10 cents a bushel. I could not raise those oats for 40 cents a bushel at that time. In fact, considering that they were sold by measure and that the weight is considerably more than the measure, they realized only about 8 cents a bushel. At the same time we were selling wheat for from 35 cents a bushel to 45 cents a bushel. We managed to get along. We believed in State rights and State responsibility to some extent, and we thought that the two went together. So, when the farmers in my State had their wheat taken by mortgages during those hard times, and when they had crop failures by drought and otherwise, the State again and again came to their assistance and bought them seed wheat and started them in business. It never occurred to us that the Government should become our purchaser at fair profits.

The State stood back of them, and had it not been for that many of them would have become bankrupt. It never occurred to the other side of the Chamber at that time, when you were receiving pretty fair prices for your cotton, that you would bond the Government to the extent of a few hundred million dollars to take care of the crop in the Northwest.

We have never asked for any sort of a loan to help us out, but if the Government is going to make a corner on cotton to give its price a boost, then, of course, we want to come in. We have asked only one thing, and that is so to protect our markets by proper legislation as to give us the American market—give us the first opportunity in that market. You denied that with your votes; and yet, because you can not get into the German market by reason of the war, you ask us to go down into our pockets to raise the taxes to pay the interest on the bonds, and finally the principal, in order that the Government may buy your crop and keep it and hold it for a better price.

Mr. President, if we are going into that I have an amendment to the Senator's amendment that the Government should buy my oats and barley and wheat for a price compared with the cost of labor that will be just equivalent to what you are asking the Government to put in for your cotton this year. Socialism or paternalism, to my mind, is vicious, but if we have it for part of the country we must have it for the whole. Now, I am not going to take the view of the Senator that the South can not live another year with the prosperity it has had in the past. It certainly has all of the American market for its product. It certainly has had prosperity during the last year. I only know one country that is now cut off by the war that takes the exports of cotton from this country, and that is Germany. We can still send it to France and to Great Britain, and there is little doubt that our own spindles will take care of a greater proportion during the next year than they did during the last year.

The Senator quoted from a statement that I presume he took from the paper which I have here with me, and I want to read some figures in that same statement.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator made the statement that the Northwest was going to be called upon to pay a portion of the interest and the principal of the bonds that are proposed to be issued under this bill. I do not understand that that is the proposition at all. I understand that the principal and the interest are to be paid by the people who, in this emergency, are to be given the credit of the Government to relieve them; that a tax is to be levied upon the cotton that is produced hereafter sufficient to take care of that entire indebtedness.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, bonds are to be issued; the entire people of the United States will have to pay the interest on those bonds, and whether or not they will get it back again from the particular section that is to be benefited is problematical. They may and they may not.

I notice here, in the statement published on October 14, that—

Cotton consumed during September was 415,194 bales, exclusive of linters, compared with 442,435 in September last year.

Almost the same; a very slight falling off. Why, if the Senator would take time to look up the statistics he would find that our grain exports have fallen off more than the difference in the consumption here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was the consumption in the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It does not give the foreign consumption at all. I did not claim that the consumption in the United States would fall off. What I was seeking to show was the loss of our foreign trade.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that. But I want to show that you will have a steady market for what we have here, provided you take advantage of the means you have at your disposal in the South, with the great banks that offer to take and to extend loans to cover your cotton for a year.

Consumption for the two months ending September 30 was 798,874 bales against 874,785 last year.

In other words, you have used a great deal more this year than last year.

Cotton on hand September 30 in manufacturing establishments was 556,068 bales compared with 614,581 a year ago—and in independent warehouses, 1,661,856, compared with 1,295,155 a year ago.

Or considerably less—

I find from the same statement that—

Cotton spindles active numbered 30,562,185 against 30,634,381 a year ago—

Or practically the same—

Linters consumed was 27,389 bales against 27,697 a year ago—

And I might give a number of other things that show that, at least, the home demand is about normal.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I want to ask the Senator if he can state the exports this year and last year to the warring countries?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Georgia gave that information from the same article, and therefore I did not think it was necessary for me to repeat the same figures that he put into the RECORD a very short time ago. Of course the exports have fallen off immensely.

Mr. GORE. Something like a million bales for the months of August and September of this year?

Mr. McCUMBER. Somewhere about that.

Here is another article, published this morning in the Washington Post, which would indicate that there is no section of this country so poverty stricken that it can not take care of its own matters without calling upon the Government for assistance:

SOUTH LED ALL SECTIONS OF NATION IN BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT LAST YEAR.

NEW YORK, October 14.

Reports of the railroads of the United States to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the year ended June 30, 1914, throw an interesting light on the development of the South during the year as compared with other parts of the country.

One of the best measures of the progress of a community is afforded by the gross operating revenues of its railroads. Measured by this standard, the South is the only section of the country that did a larger business during the fiscal year than in the last preceding 12 months—

In other words, it is the one section of the country that has been more prosperous than the preceding year—

In the southern district, embracing the territory south of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers and east of the Mississippi River, there was an increase of $215 per mile, or 2 per cent.

These figures show that the falling off in business in all other parts of the United States during the fiscal year did not limit southern development as a whole, but that, while some lines of business may have been affected by the falling off in demand in other parts of the country, there was a substantial growth in the business of the South as a whole.

In the light of these facts it is reasonable to suppose that when the temporary depression resulting from the crisis in the cotton market has been passed over the South will again lead all other parts of the United States in its rate of business development.

If the Senator will again refer to the normal output or production of cotton in the United States and compare it with the normal production of, say, wheat in the United States, he will find that there is a much greater surplus on wheat, according to the reports of the Agricultural Department, than there is on cotton, the result of which surplus greatly depresses our price.

We are getting, as I say, about 77 cents a bushel in my State for our wheat. The Agricultural Department estimated some time ago that we would raise this year about 900,000,000 bushels. The probabilities are that that estimate was very excessive, but it is fair to say that we have probably raised 800,000,000 bushels. If we raise 800,000,000 and consume but 600,000,000 for seed and bread, we must dispose of 200,000,000 outside; and while we are disposing of that 200,000,000, the entire crop of the northwest of Canada is pouring into our State, and because it is the nearer market at the same price you will see that we may run up to 300,000,000 bushels that must be exported in wheat or in flour. That depresses our price, and we are just as much entitled to have those prices put upon a living basis, by asking the Government to appropriate $500,000,000 to do that, as you are entitled to ask that any other business shall receive the support of the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota has made one of the most remarkable speeches that has ever been uttered in this Chamber—remarkable from the standpoint of its unspeakable inconsistency. He charged us with being guilty of paternalism, of appealing to the Government when we should not do so, saying that we should take care of our own; that no business should appeal to the Government for support in any emergency; and yet he has been one of the strongest champions in this Chamber of the system of protection, the fundamental object of which is Government taxation of all the people for the support of particular industries.

If we needed an example, if we needed a precedent for anything of a paternalistic character, all that would be necessary would be to cite the system advocated by the Senator here on many former occasions, and to the principles he has so vigorously advocated. He blossoms out here as a champion of State rights, of State action; and yet, sir, the system that he has advocated taxes all the people to maintain the prices of articles produced in some of the States. He is unfair enough to base his criticisms on the fact that the home demand for cotton is as great this year as it was last year, and yet everybody who knows the industry knows that the home demand is only one-third of the entire demand, and that if we had only the American demand to depend upon absolute ruin would overwhelm the South.

I had hoped that this measure would meet with a note of sympathy on the other side of the Chamber, and that the speeches would not be characterized by a spirit of chastisement and criticism, a spirit that has little place in an emergency of this character and at a time like this.

I want to say that in contrast to the spirit evidenced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is the encouragement that has been given the "Buy-a-bale-of-cotton" movement throughout the North. While that movement has not involved a solution of the problem, yet it has evidenced a spirit of patriotic helpfulness that augurs well for the future of this Republic. It has brought assistance in thousands of cases of individual distress. In some of the northern cities arrangements were made for buying several hundred thousand bales of cotton at 10 cents a pound. In New York the business men organized a campaign for the purchase of 200,000 bales. In Chicago the business men organized a campaign for the purchase of 100,000 bales. In Baltimore an especial interest has been taken in this matter. I want to say here that in the city of Washington alone was the movement discouraged and repudiated—the city where more money is expended that comes from the pockets of the southern people than perhaps any other city in the Union.

I wrote a letter to the Washington Chamber of Commerce and asked them to join this movement, to buy one bale of cotton, as an encouragement to the South in its great crisis; and here is the answer I received:

WASHINGTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
October 8, 1914.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The board of directors last night listened with much interest to the reading of your letter of 11th with regard to purchase of a bale of cotton by the chamber.

The board directed me to express its sincere regret that it could not see its way clear at present to make the purchase. With respect and esteem,

Sincerely, yours,

THOS. GRANT, Secretary.

Mr. President, it is no wonder that the city of Washington amounts to so little commercially in this Nation and that Baltimore is one of the important trading points of the South rather than the city of Washington. Baltimore is always responsive to every need of that section. I can not believe that the members of the chamber of commerce understood the real situation or that they understood what this movement meant.

I understand that my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON], the senior Senator from Texas, has had incorporated in the RECORD a telegram from the secretary of the State Senate of Texas, now in session, giving a resolution——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Before the Senator leaves the subject of this movement for buying a bale of cotton, I think it would be interesting if he would tell us just what the movement is. I should like to know, for instance, if it is undertaken in any community, how the cotton is stored and who has charge of it. Is there a committee or some one to whom the funds could be sent for that purpose?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Oh, yes. The board of trade of almost any town or city in the South will buy a bale for anybody who desires it.

Mr. NORRIS. What is done with the bale of cotton?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bale is stored in a warehouse, insured, and a warehouse receipt sent to the purchaser.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that, while there is a general knowledge of the movement, the details of it are not understood by the people, or I believe there would be a much greater response. For instance, anyone who wanted to help in that movement would not always know just where he should write, to whom he should remit the money, what arrangements have been made in regard to the storage and care of the cotton, where it would be kept, what would be the cost of keeping it, and all those details. I want to ask the Senator if they have been worked out and if there is some committee that has charge of the matter in the various localities, so that a person buying a bale of cotton would know in advance just what it was going to cost, what the storage was going to be, and whether responsible parties were going to have charge of it, so that it could be sold when the owner desired to sell it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am very glad to say to the Senator that committees have been appointed in almost every locality in the South to take charge of the matter and to see to it that the people who buy cotton are properly cared for. I will say to him that periodicals, like the Literary Digest, the Saturday Evening Post, the Country Gentleman, Collier's, and other national publications are giving wide publicity to the movement and regard the whole measure favorably. I will state that special committees have been appointed to look after the matter in every State of the South.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. LANE. I think the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is correct, that the majority of people do not understand how to go to work to purchase the cotton, and the representatives from the South should make the details of the matter known.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. LANE. A lot of people would be glad to support the movement and have a great deal of sympathy with it, but they do not know how it will work. They do not know how to proceed to purchase a bale of cotton or anything about how it will be taken care of or stored. It is all new to them. They are not familiar with cotton. They know nothing about raw cotton or baled cotton, for it is a new subject. The people out in our part of the country are quite interested in the orange industry, and that is new to you. I think it is due that the facts should be made plain.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Nebraska does not understand me as complaining of any lack of sympathy for the movement.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. LANE. I did not understand that there was any such criticism made.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that the object I had in asking the question was to give publicity to that movement. It seems to me it is a very worthy movement, and I am satisfied people all over the country would be glad to take part in it, and I am not sure but that it might be the means, at least to a great extent, of solving the question. But the ordinary person who wanted or felt inclined to assist in the movement would not know perhaps what he ought to do, and when he did remit the money he would want to know, of course, that the cotton which was bought would be properly cared for, that responsible parties would have charge of it, and that after he had invested his money he would, in time, perhaps get it back.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall say to the Senator from Nebraska that general interest has already been expressed in the movement throughout the North. The suggestions of himself and the Senator from Oregon are very helpful, and as we proceed with the movement we will see to it that wider publicity is given and that the details are given wider advertisement.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the Senator if he can not put into the RECORD such details as I have inquired about, not necessarily now, but within a day or two, giving the names and addresses of people to whom anyone desiring to assist might write, and also the modus operandi that would have to be gone through in order to get the cotton and how the cotton will be cared for and ultimately sold.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall be very glad to do so. I shall say that in the earliest infancy of the movement I organized a Buy a Bale of Cotton Club here in the Senate. I have here the original charter, and I should like to have it inserted in the RECORD, with the names of the signers. I think the organization of that club here gave a distinct impetus to the movement throughout the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

We hereby become members of the Buy a Bale of Cotton Club of the United States Senate, and we hereby agree that we will purchase, as soon as practicable, one or more bales of cotton for not less than 10 cents a pound, basis middling.

We hereby request the county judges in each county in the South, or such officers as fill similar positions in the counties where there are no county judges, to designate a chairman of a Buy a Bale of Cotton Club in each precinct.

The southern Members of the House of Representatives are requested to form a similar organization, and the governors and other State officers of the southern cotton States are asked to assist in any way they may deem advisable.

Bankers, merchants, business and professional men generally are especially requested to cooperate, and the help of the women of the South is especially desired.

The only requirement for membership in these clubs is the purchase of at least one bale of cotton for not less than 10 cents a pound for basis middling.

Morris Sheppard, Blair Lee, John Sharp Williams, Hoke Smith, Luke Lea, Joseph E. Ransdell, John K. Shields, Claude Swanson, Frank S. White, Duncan U. Fletcher, Albert B. Fall, William J. Stone, James Hamilton Lewis, J. R. Thornton, Joe T. Robinson, James K. Vardaman, N. P. Bryan, T. P. Gore, F. M. Simmons, J. H. Bankhead, W. E. Chilton, C. A. Culberson, W. S. West, James A. Reed, William H. Thompson, Robert L. Owen, James P. Clarke.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] has just said to me that he had never heard of that organization. I had never heard of it. I wondered if the Senator has given to it even here in the Senate the publicity that it deserves and which it ought to have.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I will say to the Senator that the press handled the proposition and advertised it widely throughout the country, but only southern Members were asked to join the club here. That is the reason, perhaps, why the Senator had not heard of it before. We have not appealed to northern Senators as yet.

Mr. LANE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. LANE. I think it would appeal to all Senators, but, as the Senator knows, the newspapers are crowded with war news. The terrible struggle in Belgium detracts from other items of interest in the papers, and it is easy to overlook such a matter.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I will say that I now open the doors of the church and invite the Senator to join us. I shall be very glad to have Senators from Northern States as well as Southern States join the movement.

I was referring to the telegram which had been received from the Texas State Senate. I want to have it read, so that it may be a part of my remarks, although it has already been put in the RECORD this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the telegram will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

AUSTIN, TEX., October 14, 1914.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The following simple resolution by Senators Henderson and Gibson was to-day adopted by the Senate of Texas:

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Texas, That we hereby indorse the amendment as proposed by the southern Senators and offered as an amendment to the war-tax bill, wherein it is proposed that the National Government issue $250,000,000 of 4 per cent three-year bonds, and that said bonds shall be used to purchase 5,000,000 bales of this year's cotton, at 10 cents per pound, and providing that said cotton shall not be sold by the Government until 1916 and 1917, and that we hereby request the Congress of the United States to pass said amendment, and that a copy of this resolution be wired to our Senators, Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON and Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD."

W. V. HOWERTON,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, to show what the Federal Government has been doing recently in behalf of certain sections of the country, I want to read an extract from an address delivered recently by Hon. John Skelton Williams, the brilliant and courteous Comptroller of the Currency, before the annual convention of the Indiana Bankers' Association a few days ago at Indianapolis, Ind. He said, in part:

Although this country had shipped abroad between May 1 and August 31, 1914, in payment of securities sold here for foreign account and in payment of debts due abroad, including balances due by importers, more than a hundred and sixteen million dollars of gold, the outbreak of the war found us with debts falling due in European countries between August 1 and January 1, 1915, amounting, as far as can be estimated, to between three hundred and four hundred million dollars. The largest portion of this indebtedness due by any one borrower was represented by the loans placed abroad of the city of New York, amounting to some $82,000,000. Had the world been left at peace our exports of cotton, of food products, and other merchandise between August 1 and January 1, 1915, normally would have amounted to more than $1,000,000,000, or enough to pay off the floating debt to Europe, to settle for all imports during the same period and show a handsome balance due us.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the exports of cotton alone have formed the chief bulwark of our gold payments abroad and of our balance of trade, and the fact that we are deprived of $600,000,000 of gold with which we would discharge that indebtedness abroad this year makes this cotton problem a national problem and involves the whole Government, as well as the southern section. But to continue the quotation from Mr. Williams.

But when the 1st of August came, instead of launching our fleets of merchantmen laden with the fruits of our most bountiful harvests of cotton, wheat, and other merchandise, we faced the forbidden clouds of war suddenly gathered. All Europe seemed to rush to convert our securities, offering, as they did, better hope than any other for realization into gold, while all markets were closed against what we had to sell. It was necessary for us to seal our exchanges against our bonds and shares, as Europe had closed hers to our cotton, wheat, minerals, and manufactures. By this action one pressing and imminent danger was met and averted.

On Saturday, August 1, following the dumping upon the market for foreign account of an avalanche of bonds and shares held by foreigners, the reserves of the New York banks fell more than $40,000,000 below legal requirements. The stock exchange had been closed, but the drain upon the resources of the New York banks had set in from many directions, and there was alarm and cause for it. Responding promptly to urgent appeals, the Secretary of the Treasury went over to New York Sunday afternoon, August 2, and held a conference that night with a score or more of the presidents of the leading banks and trust companies of the metropolis. He heard their statements, analyzed the situation quickly, saw what was necessary to enable the banks to meet the demands upon them and to restore confidence, which had been so racked by the world-shaking events of the week. Confidence in the Government, the people and the ultimate resources of the country was absolute, but there was need to meet immediate and urgent emergency. Knowing that confidence and the soundness of the basis for it, the Secretary announced that the Government would supply the New York banks forthwith with as much as $100,000,000 of additional currency if it should be needed. Anticipating the situation as it was laid before him at that conference, he had that Sunday morning, before leaving Washington, directed the shipment by express to the Subtreasury in New York for the New York banks of $40,000,000, and the Treasury forces and the express companies at that moment were taxing their resources in hurrying the execution of the order.

The announcement that the Treasury had arranged to give the New York banks a hundred millions of currency was flashed that night over the wires to every section of the country, along with the assurance that the New York City banks were prepared to honor all requests of their country bank correspondents for shipments of currency against their balances. Therefore there was no suspension of currency payments or premium on currency as in the comparatively limited stringencies of 1893 and 1907.

A few weeks later leading bankers from New York came to Washington to ask if the Government would lend its support in enabling New York City to raise, through a syndicate of bankers, the funds necessary to provide for the city's loans of $82,000,000 just maturing abroad.

There was no panic here, no actual distress here, no tremendous emergency. It was mere maturity of part of the debt of one of the municipalities of the United States. Continues Mr. Williams:

They were assured by the Secretary of the Treasury that the Government would cooperate by providing the banks with a further amount of currency and would accept a fair proportion of New York City's new notes or bonds as the basis for such currency, in order to help the bankers carry out the plan for the funding of the city's floating indebtedness; and since that time the Treasury Department has actually furnished to the New York banks $50,000,000 of additional currency, making the total amount accorded to the banks of that city from the Treasury since August 1 more than $140,000,000.

Now, Mr. President, if the Government could help a city of 5,000,000 people discharge its loans abroad by a direct transfer of $50,000,000 of currency from the Treasury to a syndicate of that city's bankers, is it not reasonable for the cotton farmers, composing a majority of the people in one-third of this Republic, to request the Government for aid to the extent of $250,000,000 in bonds, safely secured, when that aid involves no loss to the Government? You can not explain it to the cotton farmers of the South, and there is no explanation, unless it is that we have one mode of treatment for one section of the country and another mode for the other.

I have heard my generous and eloquent friend from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] say that if this emergency which is now destroying the South had occurred between Washington and New England, or between the Potomac River and the northern border of this country, steps would already have been taken to secure the necessary relief. This was said in no spirit of sectionalism, in no spirit of complaint. I repeat what has been done by the Government within the last 40 or 50 days to show that we are not without reason in making this request, to show that we do not deserve the criticism of the Senator from North Dakota, nor the criticisms made under their breath by some Senators and Representatives from our own section. There lies the trouble. If we could present a united front here, with every Member from our own section putting their efforts into the same proposition, we would have better prospect of success.

Mr. President, having already addressed the Senate on the subject of relief for the cotton growers of the South, I shall claim your attention for but a short time to-day. The pending amendment represents the combined judgment of a number of southern Senators who have been considering the matter at the several meetings they have recently held. I had the honor to participate in the conferences which developed this amendment, conferences at which not only the bill S. 6565, presented by me in the Senate, was discussed, but, in addition, practically all the measures that have been proposed in behalf of the cotton farmer. The result of these conferences is the pending amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. We have subordinated individual differences and individual opinions in an effort to reach the common ground represented by this amendment. We believe that it contains a plain and practical solution of the most terrible situation that has confronted the South since the war god smote her fields and firesides a half century ago.

The appeals that are coming in every mail to southern Senators and Representatives from their constituents are so freighted with tidings of disaster that we would be unworthy of our positions if we did not employ every possible means to secure relief, if we did not brave the criticisms such as those which have come from the Senator from North Dakota to-day.

If hostile fleets were bombarding southern ports, if invading armies were sweeping Southern States, the Nation would not hesitate to expend hundreds of millions of dollars—nay, to send millions of citizens, to her defense. The peril to the Nation as well as the South would be immediately recognized. And yet, the principal commodity of the South, the principal dependence of 21,000,000 of her people for subsistence, has been as completely bereft of value as if invading hordes had put the torch to 14,000,000 bales of cotton, reducing that fairest of all lands to poverty, her people to destitution. It is impossible for the Nation to avoid a share in this catastrophe if it be not modified or averted. If war in Europe could so fatally affect one-third of a Republic 4,000 miles away, separated from the arena of destruction by an ocean's width, how may the inhabitants of the other two-thirds of that Republic hope to escape the ruin that festers on their very borders.

The American people are now so closely knit by every tie of blood and interest that the woes of one section are the woes of all.

I say to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] that if he ever comes here with a plea for his people he will find me among those to support him, that it is no proper indictment of us to say that when his people suffered their representatives did not ask for relief.

The American people are united by the proudest memories that ever spurred a people to the path of glory. Theirs is the kinship of a common purpose, a common valor, a common sacrifice. They sought these shores to escape a common oppression to find a common liberty. Here they faced common dangers as they erected the foundations of a common freedom. A common impulse prompted them to revolution. When that struggle for their common rights began, the rattlesnake banner of South Carolina floated by the side of the pine-tree flag of Massachusetts. Northerners and southerners challenged a common death at Brandywine and Germantown and Saratoga. They shared the famine and the cold of Valley Forge. Together they charged at Monmouth and at Stony Point. They were comrades at Camden, at Kings Mountain, at Guilford Courthouse, at Eutaw Springs, at Yorktown. Again, their swords made common cause on Lake Champlain, Lake Erie, at Lundys Lane, at New Orleans. In the last-named conflict cotton bales were used for breastworks, and against them the hostile missiles poured in vain. What greater demonstration could be desired of the imperishable character of cotton, of the fact that the Government may safely purchase it as directed by this amendment. And with what added earnestness may we of the South appeal to the American Congress to save the staple that in a stressful hour saved this Republic! Again, sir, sons of North and South marched to common triumphs at Palo Alto, at Buena Vista, at Cerro Gordo, and Chapultepec. And though they turned their bayonets against each other in the sixties they made a common record of such valor, such loyalty to principle, that it will shine on their posterity to the end of time, uniting this Republic forever. All of us here will recall how both sections were represented at Manila, at Santiago Bay, at Guantanamo, Las Guasimas, and San Juan Hill. To show that the common spirit still lives I need but point to the new-made graves in Northern and in Southern States of those who only a few months ago gave up their lives in a common sacrifice for their country at Vera Cruz. To-day there is not a citizen on the remotest coast of Maine for whom any Texan on the farthest windings of the Rio Grande would not die, if need be, in his defense.

Mr. President, is it too much to hope that such memories will prompt the American Congress to take such action as will save one-third of this Republic from economic disaster? We know what ruin means in the South; it is a land of Calvaries, of Gethsemanes. There is more of the cypress than the laurel in its crown. It has risen from the wreckage of the past to give the Union a devotion as unchanging as it is beautiful. It has contributed of its hard-earned substance without complaint to the support of the Federal Government, to the $4,000,000,000 that have gone as pensions to the survivors of the northern armies, paying pensions at the same time to its own soldiers and their destitute widows as well out of its own means.

The Federal Government is the only agency sufficiently powerful to meet the emergency, and the plan we propose safeguards it against loss. If there has ever been or if there is ever to be an occasion in which the Nation should come to the aid of the South, that occasion now confronts us. If the Nation stays its hand in this crisis, the South will face the most desolate winter in 50 years, with the knowledge that a Government dedicated to brotherhood, hailed as a refuge of the oppressed, the richest and the strongest in the world, has heard its cries, but answered not. Well may the South then understand that she is in the Union, but not of it, not bone of its bone or blood of its blood.

I decline to believe that the Nation will assume this attitude toward the South. If Lincoln were in this Chamber to-day, his voice would be raised for this amendment, and from his great, sad heart would flow a tide of sympathy for his mother's land that would bring to it the Nation's aid, the Nation's prayers, the Nation's tears.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from Texas a question.

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield to the Senator from Washington for that purpose.

Mr. JONES. What the Senator said is certainly very beautifully and well said. It may be that some one has already stated the real necessities of the situation in the South; but if so, I have not heard it. I want to consider this amendment in a sympathetic way, because if the people of the South are in the direful stress that the general statement would have us infer,

I would be perfectly willing to stretch a point—indeed, a good many points—to help them out. I was in hopes——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I went into the situation at some length some days ago, and I did not deem it necessary to repeat the details now. I will be very glad, however, to be more specific.

Mr. JONES. Of course the Senator knows how these statements are made when nothing is really pending; how, when there is no amendment pending, little attention is given to them. I have tried to be here pretty regularly; but I confess I missed the Senator's statement, and I have not had the time to read it. I was in hopes that the Senator would go into the details and point out really what the troubles are.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I will state, also, Mr. President, that we had a hearing on this subject, and in that hearing before the Committee on Banking and Currency the facts were detailed.

Mr. JONES. I am not a member of that committee, and I heard nothing of that testimony; I know nothing about what was said there. I will say that I am called upon to pass on this amendment without any information, except the general statement that there is a bad condition in the South relative to the cotton situation.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Did the Senator hear the speech of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] this morning?

Mr. JONES. I am sorry to say that I had to go to the department this morning on account of a previous engagement, and I did not get an opportunity to hear that speech.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Then the Senator ought not to charge that we have dealt only in generalities.

Mr. JONES. Oh, I did not make that charge.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator from Texas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES. I was not making any charge.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator is mistaken, then, when he says that only generalities have been advanced here to-day. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] went into details.

Mr. JONES. I was referring largely to the statements of the Senator from Texas. Of course, it was my misfortune that I could not be here to hear the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will suggest to the Senator from Washington that in the course of this discussion all those facts will be very fully brought out. As was stated by the Senator from Texas, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] gave a very exhaustive statement this morning descriptive of the conditions in the South, and it will appear in the RECORD to-morrow.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was on account of the fact that the Senator from Georgia had occupied the floor for an hour and a half to-day and described the situation fully that I confined myself to a general statement of the situation. I stated in my remarks also that having addressed the Senate last week I did not think it advisable to consume more time now by giving details. I thought the facts were generally understood.

Mr. JONES. Of course, there have been statements made about it, but the Senator, no doubt, appreciates the fact that aside from the situation in the South this is an important proposition, a proposition that involves a great many very important principles of government really, and we ought to be made thoroughly familiar with it by those pressing it. The conditions will bear repetition, as far as that is concerned, to justify legislation of this character. I will say, as I said a moment ago, I want to vote for this proposition.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I appreciate the feeling of the Senator.

Mr. JONES. I am led to think that the situation is serious, but I want to know what it is, and I want to know of its seriousness. If its seriousness will justify it, I will vote for it even though I think it may violate some of the fundamental principles of our Government.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have a brief description of the situation right here that I will send to the Senator.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to make just this statement to the Senator from Washington, that if we do not convince him of the emergency, we will not expect his vote.

Mr. JONES. I want not only to be convinced of the emergency, but that this measure will take care of the emergency in a reasonable way; that the man who needs help will really get it. That is what I want to get at.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator from Utah the floor? I wish to ask the Senator from Texas a question.

Mr. SMOOT. I have the floor, but I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. There is another question connected with this matter in which I am interested. I think we all sympathize with the conditions in which the South finds itself, and if it were a thing that we could readily or legally do I do not think that there would be very much opposition. But there are three questions involved in the proposition. The first is the question of policy, which I am not going to discuss. The second is our constitutional power to do what we are seeking to do. The third is the practical proposition with reference to the matter of legislation.

Now, the press carries this morning the news that the President will veto this measure. We are nearing the close of the session, and, of course, if it is vetoed it would not be passed over his veto. If we take it up for discussion, it will be here for the next seven or eight days, and there are some of us on this side who would like to know whether there is any authority for the publication of such a statement.

Mr. SHEPPARD. None whatever, so far as I am informed

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the statement? That the President would veto the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. Gladly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is that the statement the Senator made a moment ago?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That the President would veto it?

Mr. BORAH. I say that is published in the press.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think anybody has the right to indulge the presumption that the President is going to do an improper thing until he does it.

Mr. BORAH. That should be true; but this is what the paper carries——

Mr. OVERMAN. What paper?

Mr. BORAH. The correspondent of the New York Sun from this city says:

> It may be said on authority that if Congress incorporates an amendment in the war-revenue bill authorizing the issuance of bonds to be used in the purchase of cotton the measure will be vetoed by President Wilson. President Wilson also will veto any of the proposals made for the direct purchase of cotton or any other product or output of an industry that finds itself in distress as a result of the war in Europe.

That raises some perfectly legitimate questions. In view of the interview which was had by the Secretary of the Treasury the other day in regard to this matter, and in view of publications of this nature, it becomes of some importance for us to know whether, if we shall earnestly work out a proper plan with which to deal with this matter at this late hour in the session, there is any hope that we shall thereby accomplish anything?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I hope the Senator will not permit any rumored threat that the President may veto this measure or any opposition that may arise in this body or anywhere else to deter him from giving the South and the American people the benefit of his ripe experience and splendid intellect in the effort to work out the solution of this problem. I can not believe the President would think of vetoing a measure that does not violate the Constitution and which would give such widespread and much-needed relief to the whole country as this measure is intended to afford.

I want to say in this connection that this amendment, in my judgment, is crude; there are defects in it, some features of which I do not approve; but I hope that by the attrition of suggestions and by the friction of ideas the truth may be evolved and this threatened disaster averted. It is a question that should appeal to and command the best effort of our wisest and most patriotic statesmen. The spirit of sectionalism and hope for partisan advantage are out of place in this discussion. The loftiest patriotism and purest altruism should characterize our deliberations.

Permit me in this connection to say further, Mr. President, that I am sick and tired of the talk we hear in the Senate and on the streets of Washington to the effect that nothing dare be done by Congress until it has the O. K. of the White House. Such a reputation is very uncomplimentary to the Congress. I have as great respect for the President as has any man on this floor. He is a man of great learning and extraordinary force; he has also human limitations. But whatever his abilities or limitations may be, he has his function to perform as the President of the United States, while we have ours as the legislative department of the Government. The framers of the Government intended that the legislative department of the Government should be the head of the Government, while the Executive was designed to be its hand. The former was to do the thinking, the latter the executing. I agree with the wisdom of the original plan. I think it altogether prudent to discuss with the President public questions, to listen to his advice with open mind; but the Congressman who makes himself the mere puppet to be moved by the presidential pull discredits the high place he holds and basely repudiates his first obligation to his constituents.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is sound doctrine, Mr President, but I have been taught to respect the power of the President. I would not have raised this question upon the simple publication in one paper, although from so reliable a correspondent, but it has been floating out upon the political atmosphere for several days; and I merely should like to feel that while we are at work here, we shall not be working in vain. I am satisfied the situation is such that we can be made to know whether or not that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator from Utah for a moment, if he will permit me to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to state to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that the President of the United States has been known to change his mind. In fact, after an explicit declaration on the Panama Canal tolls matter, he changed his mind completely. He may change his mind about this matter if he finds there is any real equity and justice in it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a proviso at the end of the amendment proposed by Mr. SMITH of Georgia the following:

Provided further, That whenever the price of copper in bars, ingots, or pigs shall fall below 10 cents per pound, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase all of the copper, in bars, ingots, or pigs offered for sale at said price. It shall be the duty of the said Secretary of the Treasury to store and hold said copper until it can be sold at a profit of 2 cents per pound.

The sum of $50,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to meet the purchase price and the expenses of this provision.

To secure the necessary funds to carry out this purchasing project the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds of the United States, bearing 4 per cent interest, in such denominations as he may determine, and due in three years from the date of issue; said bonds shall not be sold for less than par.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Did we not pass a bill, which the Senator from Utah introduced a short time ago, for the purchase of a certain amount of silver?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate passed a bill which I introduced on August 24, 1914, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase not to exceed 15,000,000 ounces of silver, and for other purposes. That was to anticipate the wants of the Government; and no one doubts that the Government would use that amount of silver in its regular business within three years at the outside. Not only that, Mr. President, the bill did not direct the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase the silver, but left it absolutely in his discretion.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But, as a matter of fact, the bill would not have been thought of except for the unusual conditions prevailing in the country. Was it not the real purpose of the bill to help the condition of the owners of silver?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt of it; and I want to say that I am very sorry the committee in the House has refused so far to report the bill to the House.

Mr. President, I am not going to ask for a vote on the amendment which I have proposed unless the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is adopted by the Senate. I wish to say to southern Senators that they can not picture a distressed condition in the South on account of the lack of a market for cotton any more distressing than could be pictured of the conditions in the West, and particularly in the States where copper is produced. I recognize, and did so when I introduced the bill authorizing the purchase of silver by the Secretary of the Treasury, that it was against all precedents. I stated at that time that conditions were distressing in the copper industry, but did not and was not intending to ask Congress to pass a bill for the relief of the producers of copper. I believe all those who spoke in favor of the silver-purchase bill called attention to the conditions that existed in the West on account of the utter demoralization of the copper market.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah the number of States producing copper and the number of people engaged in its production.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the Statistical Abstract with me, but I will say that the principal States producing copper are Arizona, Michigan, Utah, Colorado, Idaho, and Montana, as well as most of the other western mining States.

Mr. FLETCHER. What number of people are engaged in its production?

Mr. SMOOT. Over 100,000 are so engaged, Mr. President. I will say that the amount of the exportations of copper alone for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, was 974,791,676 pounds, having a value of $144,895,519.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have not asked the question with any view of minimizing the importance of the industry at all, but for purposes of information. For the purpose of obtaining further information I desire to inquire whether or not copper is not being marketed at very good figures at the present time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the price of copper before the European war began was between 16 and 17 cents a pound. To-day the quotation is 10.30 in New York. I sent to New York this morning a telegram asking the price of copper there this morning, and the answer was that it was 10.30 bid; 10.40 asked. So the Senator from Florida can see the decrease in the price of copper, which, of course, has been brought about by the conditions existing in foreign countries.

I want also to say to the Senator from Florida that the producers of copper are in a worse condition than are the producers of cotton, by reason of the fact that we are not allowed to export copper in neutral bottoms to neutral countries. Great Britain has taken the position that we can not export it even to Holland, claiming that if it were exported to Holland it might in some way reach the German or Austrian Governments.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. VARDAMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to ask under what rule of neutrality we are not permitted to export copper?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say I do not believe that there is such a rule, and I believe that such action is in violation of international law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It may be regarded as contraband.

Mr. SMOOT. But the British Government claims——

Mr. BORAH. Yes; the British Government claims it; but I do not care anything about what the British Government claims. I should like to have some better authority for prohibiting our exportation of that kind of stuff or of food products of any kind.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, to neutral countries?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not myself believe that there is any authority of international law for such a contention; but there is no question that the British Government is making that contention and will not allow foodstuffs to be shipped into neutral countries, where they think those foodstuffs will reach Germany or Austria; and that is true as to copper.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if England has made that suggestion—and we are heeding that suggestion—instead of walking in the light of the laws of neutrality we are violating those laws ourselves. We have a perfect right to ship food products or anything of that kind to any neutral nation; and the fact that they may incidentally get into some other nation or be utilized by some other nation that is at war has nothing to do with the general proposition.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Will the Senator from Utah allow me to make a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I do

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to reply to the query of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. The same question came up last week as to the shipment of certain cottonseed products. Complaints came to the effect that England had refused to allow the shipment of cottonseed cakes into Holland on the ground that Holland, as a base, was being used as an open door for the shipment of foodstuffs into Germany. I went to see the Secretary of State regarding it and was referred to the Solicitor, who informed me that the matter had been taken up with the British Government, and that the British Government had withdrawn any such intimation—there seems to have been some intimation to that effect—that Holland was considered a neutral country, and that all articles not contraband of war were being shipped freely into Holland over the Holland-American Steamship Line.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I said that cotton was in a better situation than copper, which is borne out by the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina. England has declared copper contraband of war. Of course that declaration applies to the exportation of copper to any of the belligerent countries; but they go further than that, and say that copper can not be shipped in neutral bottoms nor can it be shipped to neutral countries because of the fear that it will ultimately reach the hands of their enemy.

It is true—and I want to be perfectly frank with the Senate—that the British ambassador has made the statement that, so far as the British Government is concerned, if the neutral government will guarantee to England that the exports of copper to that neutral country will be for home or local consumption, the British Government will allow the copper to enter the neutral country. I understand that that was demanded of Holland before foodstuffs could be shipped into Holland from the United States.

I do not know how long, Mr. President, it is going to take the foreign countries to agree upon the proposition; I do not know whether they will agree or not; but if they would agree, so far as I am concerned, I can not see why there should be any particular objection on our part. England having declared copper contraband of war, but I say to the Senate now that——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. Gladly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Does not the Senator know that the copper production of this country is under the control of great trusts? The principal owners of copper are the Standard Oil Co. and the Amalgamated Copper Co. Does not the Senator also know that there is not $50,000,000 worth of copper in existence in this country to-day? What he is complaining about is that they do not go on and dig more.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that the facts do not at all bear out the statement he has just made.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. In what respect do they fail to do so?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that, so far as most of the West is concerned, copper is produced by mine owners, and they are not members of any trust. The smelter buys ore from the producer. I think that is the case in every State in this Union that produces copper. The price of copper is, of course, fixed by the smelters, and the smelters fix the price upon the quotations of the New York market, which, in turn, are controlled by the foreign price.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am talking about the supply of existing copper. Does the Senator believe there is any such amount as $50,000,000 worth of copper in existence in the United States to-day?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not say how much there is, but I want to say to the Senator that the production of copper——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Its value in 1912 was $205,000,000, and we exported $113,000,000 worth of it.

Mr. SMOOT. We exported $140,000,000 worth of it last year.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. All the figures for last year have not been officially reported as yet in the regular Statistical Abstract.

Mr. SMOOT. I got my figures direct from the Treasury Department.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. What I wanted to ascertain was the condition about which the Senator is complaining in connection with the copper industry. Does he not complain of the fact that they have stopped digging copper, and that, therefore, those who formerly dug copper from the ground are not employed at this time?

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly true.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is not the condition in the South. They have a crop ready to deliver.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, copper is produced from the ore in the ground into copper matte perhaps within 30 or 45 days. That is not the case with cotton. It takes a full year to produce cotton; but the men who are engaged in the production of copper are out of employment and the man who has produced cotton has not a market to pay him for his cotton that has already been produced by his labor. Now, there is not a particle of difference as to the result; they are both hurt; they are both in distress, and conditions are such that——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I agree with the Senator that they are both in distress. The Senator seems to think that the condition of the cotton grower is probably better, because, as he says, the cotton grower can sell the product of his toil. Well, as a matter of fact, the cotton grower has already expended more than the cotton will sell for at this time. If he sells it, he does not get enough for it to pay what he owes; he simply sacrifices it; he is compelled, as it were, to throw that away. There is no market; the laws of supply and demand for the time are suspended.

I agree with the Senator that where the Government can, without violating fundamental principles or doing violence to its polity or the genius of its construction, it should at all times go to the assistance of the citizen. If the Senator's proposition were in the same category as the proposition with reference to cotton, I would not hesitate to vote for it.

When a man comes here and asks the Government of the United States to lend him its credit in order to hold his cotton until the present abnormal condition shall change and the normal conditions be reestablished, and his proposition is so safe and sane that the Government shall not lose a cent by doing it, where we propose to levy a tax upon ourselves to pay the expense of carrying out this scheme, and where we, by levying a tax upon ourselves, indemnify the Government against every possible loss, I do not see—if it is not violative of the Constitution—I do not see why the Government should not lend its credit to the extent of $250,000,000 in bonds.

I would be opposed to the measure if it taxed the Senator's constituents one dime. I do not think you are called upon to give the South a penny, but we are not here asking for assistance as mendicants; we are not begging. We are an integral part of this great Government, and I maintain that it is our right to invoke the aid of the Government to assist us in bridging this financial chasm by saving us from a sacrifice which will be not only disastrous to the South but hurtful to the entire country. The remainder of the Republic would not possibly suffer any loss if this amendment should be adopted.

I am in favor of levying a tax on the cotton of the South sufficient for the year 1915 to pay all the interest on the bonds and all the cost of maintaining or carrying out this plan, and I am in favor of following that by a tax for 1916 which will put it beyond the possibility of any cost to the General Government.

We are simply asking, Mr. President, this great and rich Government to lend us its functions, its great power, to save us from bankruptcy and to save the whole people from a tremendous loss. The only power beneath the blue canopy of heaven that can save the South from serious financial embarrassment is the Government of these United States. It is a case of "Help me, Cassius, or I sink." And I trust the Congress will not refuse us the helping, saving hand.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator knew the situation as it really exists in the West, he would not have made the statement that conditions there are different from those in the South. The emergency exists in both cases; they are upon all fours. The proposition with you is that you can not sell your cotton under present conditions, and with us that we can not sell our copper.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the Senator, to be perfectly fair and keep the parallel, ought to keep in mind this very vital difference: We have on hand, already produced, the entire output of a year from the cotton fields, amounting last year in value to a billion dollars, and under normal conditions worth this year a billion dollars. While you are pleading, not for that which is already produced but for the privilege of going on and keeping men employed in producing it, we have come here and asked the Government to help take care of what we have already produced. The article is now between the bagging and the ties, and the merchants and the producers are asking the Government to help them distribute what has already been made during the period of a year in order that we can come out without a loss, rather than asking them to valorize it and let us go on and produce more. That is the characteristic difference.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield in a moment. The Senator's argument would be true if the South were going to stop raising cotton; but it is not going to stop. The South is going to plant cotton this year, and there is no difference between planting cotton now for next year's crop and producing copper now for a future market—not a particle. Not only that, but I will say to the Senator that if it were known in all the world that no cotton would be produced in the Southern States next year, nobody would have any trouble in selling the cotton now on hand; and not only that, but if the boards of trade of the great centers were open I do not believe that you would have very much trouble in selling cotton, because there would be immense speculation in it. So it comes right back to the one question of sale, and whether the commodity be produced this month for a future market or next year for a future market makes no difference. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from South Carolina what I was going to ask the Senator from Georgia a few moments ago, and that is, Does the Senator believe, if this measure passes Congress, it will become a law?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Emphatically I do.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator take any stock in the proposition that the President would veto the bill?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Not this bill; I do not believe he would. I want to repeat right in this connection, Mr. President, to the Senator from Idaho, that I believe if Congress—the House and the Senate—realized, as they seem now to be realizing, the far-reaching effect of the absolute tie-up of a billion dollars, the far-reaching effect in the commercial world that the lack of the sale of our cotton crop is producing, they would take steps to relieve the situation.

On the very point that the Senator from Utah mentioned a moment ago—that the world will not now even pay the value of the cotton they must have, because they are afraid that a large crop will be planted next year—I will say that the tax in this bill will act as a deterrent in that respect. I had a telegram not more than an hour ago from a member of the State Legislature of South Carolina, from the chairman of the committee on the cotton congress, saying that the probabilities were that the bill for the total elimination of cotton planting in South Carolina would pass before next week, showing that the people in the cotton-growing States are thoroughly aroused to the seriousness and the disaster that confronts them. With the banks tied up, with the merchants tied up, and the effect of the loss of a billion-dollar crop reaching throughout the whole commercial world of America, I believe that if Congress will authorize the issuance of bonds it will tide us temporarily over this disastrous condition and bring about the very condition the Senator from Utah mentioned a moment ago, namely, that the crop of this year will not be duplicated next year, and we will have no difficulty then in financing it. That is precisely what we are trying to do now, and I do not believe that the President of the United States or any other patriot would step in and perpetuate the condition that is confronting the whole American people and threatening to bring disaster and ruin to the South.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is an open secret everywhere that the President is thoroughly opposed to this amendment, and that he will veto the bill if it passes with this amendment in it; and that is one of the things I want to be satisfied on if I can. I am glad to have that assurance from the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let me say to the Senator from Idaho that I was one of the southern Senators who met with the Senator from Georgia, who is now on the floor, for the purpose of drafting this amendment, and I have not heard of a single member of that conference who has spoken of it to the President; and if he has given any utterance in reference to this amendment I have not heard it. I think that is totally gratuitous, unless some newspaper reporter may have had some means of communication that we have not availed ourselves of.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from Utah under what provision of the Constitution of the United States he offers his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not offer it under any provision of the Constitution of the United States, and in my opening statement I remarked that I did not propose to ask for a vote upon the amendment unless the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was adopted by the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. I take it, then, that the Senator from Utah was of the opinion that one bad precedent deserved another.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah took the position that if a condition exists in the South that requires the passage of legislation of this kind, certainly the conditions in the West require the same kind of legislation.

Mr. BORAH. I presume, as a mere question of policy, that would be true.

Mr. SMOOT. And I thought it ought to come at the same identical time.

Mr. BORAH. There is no doubt that the policy of the Senator is justifiable, and can be defended; but does not the Senator think that before this law could be put into effect in all probability somebody would have to meet the constitutional question, and somebody would have courage enough to do it?

Mr. SMOOT. I think so, and I will frankly admit it.

Mr. LANE. Mr President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. LANE. I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question, with the permission of the Senator from Utah. I understood him to say that the legislature in his State will pass a bill prohibiting altogether the planting of cotton next year.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That was stated in a telegram I received from the president of the cotton congress.

Mr. LANE. I understand it is the intention throughout the South to curtail the planting of cotton. In the event that the cotton States do prohibit or discourage the planting of cotton, I should like to ask what provision they are going to make for the employment and the sustenance of the people who are engaged in gathering and handling cotton? Will not that create another emergency there, and will not some provision have to be made for them? Will not that bring disaster upon a lot of other people later on—next year, for instance?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I spoke a moment ago of this bill for the total elimination of cotton planting as showing to what extent the people of that section realize the disaster confronting them. I myself know that there will be enforced reductions. I believe it will be better to have legal reductions, to bind it so that this disaster will not take place again; but I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the farmers of the South, with every encouragement, planted and made this crop. With the conditions that have precipitated this disaster still continuing, you may rest assured that next year they will engage in raising foodstuffs, and engage in other occupations that will not lead to a repetition of the condition in which they find themselves. In the meantime, however, they are just asking that they may be tided over until such time as this world-wide necessity—for that is what cotton is—can be sold for its true value. Cotton does not go into the same category with any other article.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If I understood the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], there is a provision in it that in case the cotton that is purchased by the United States should not pay the bonds, the interest and other payments are to be secured upon the crop of the next year.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. And the crop of the year after that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Now, if you do not raise any crop next year, what security does the Government have?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, it may be that South Carolina will cut off the production entirely, but it is absolutely certain that the majority of the States will not do so.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then we add a tax in 1916 and a tax in 1917 for that purpose. The proposed extreme curtailment in South Carolina has application alone to South Carolina, and alone to next year's crop. There is no thought in my own State of abandoning the planting of cotton next year. I think it would be a great national and world-wide misfortune if the South should entirely abandon the planting of cotton—a misfortune to the South and a misfortune to the country.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, I should like to say to the Senator from Michigan that if the Government issues these bonds at the rate of 10 cents a pound he may rest assured that if we totally eliminate the planting of cotton next year the Government will suffer no loss, because the five millions she has will bring more than what she puts into them, and a tax will not be necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is not any doubt about that. If that were done, cotton would sell for over 15 cents a pound, and the Government would make a handsome profit.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I take it that the Senator from South Carolina would not advise that policy generally as to production throughout the United States.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I would not, unless it were proved between now and the time next year when we would normally plant our cotton that the dropping off of exportations had continued as it is going on now. We have made enough this year to supply the world for two years in that event.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I mean the Senator would not advise the application of that principle to other crops than cotton. We have laws on the statute books prohibiting combinations in restraint of trade and combinations that seek to limit production, and yet, if I understand the Senator correctly—and I have understood it from other sources—the proposition here is to limit, by agreement—and the Senator would have it by law—the production of a great staple necessity, according to the statement that has been made.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Utah will allow me to reply in a word, I think the affirmative always carries the negative, and I think if we have laws here to prohibit disaster from restraint of trade we ought to have common sense enough and patriotism enough to avert disaster, if possible, by promoting trade; and that is what we are doing here.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think this little side discussion has brought out the fact that both the South and the West are suffering because of a lack of a market for their principal products, and I do not believe there is any difference whatever between one case and the other. We both lack a market, and we both have to produce the products for sale. Therefore I shall not spend any more time upon that question.

The Senator from Mississippi referred to the levying of a tax by the Government of the United States upon the cotton produced in the South. I do not profess to be a constitutional lawyer, but I do not believe the Government of the United States can levy a tax upon cotton produced in the South; I do not believe the Government of the United States can levy a tax upon the copper produced in the West, or the production of any article in any part of this country. That, however, is a matter for consideration when we get to the consideration of this amendment. I do believe that if the amendment offered becomes a part of the bill, and the imposition of a tax on cotton production is a part of the act, it will be declared unconstitutional. I do not believe the Government of the United States has that power.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A tax was levied directly on cotton, and $68,000,000 is now in the Treasury, derived from it, that never has been paid out.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that conditions were quite different at the time of the imposition of that tax than they are to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Supreme Court was equally divided upon whether it was constitutional or unconstitutional—4 to 4.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no doubt but that if that question were resubmitted to the Supreme Court of the United States to-day it would be unanimously against the proposition.

As I read the Senator's amendment, its real object is to regulate the price of cotton at the present time. We are not asking, in the amendment I propose, that a price shall be paid for copper that is more than the market price, even under the circumstances existing to-day. The difficulty with the Senator's amendment is that we are placing a price upon cotton nearly 70 per cent, and, in fact, I suppose 100 per cent, from what the Senator has said, above the market value of the cotton to-day; that is, I mean the market price of the cotton, not the value of it, because I believe that cotton anywhere in the world under normal conditions to-day would be worth 10 cents a pound. Therefore the value of it is 10 cents a pound, but the market price of it is only about half that value.

Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate just now to discuss this question further. If the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is accepted, then I will have a little more to say about my amendment.

I want to say to the Senator, also, that we can not eat copper any more than the people of the South can eat cotton. We can not live on it any more than the people of the South can live on cotton; so, as far as the two products are concerned, every condition is identical. The condition is that hundreds and thousands of our people are out of employment, and the industry is almost paralyzed.

I want, also, to give credit to the men who are buying the ore from the mines that are still in operation. They are carrying the load just as far as it is possible for them to secure money from any source in the United States to do it. The smelters are doing everything they can to continue operations, and intend to do so as long as there is a chance for them to secure money from the regular channels of trade to pay for the ore that is being mined at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). The Secretary will state the first amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment of the committee passed over is on page 3, where the committee proposes to strike out section 2 as printed in the House bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire, in the language of the court, "where we are at." Are we on the main bill now, or are we on the cotton amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are on a committee amendment that was passed over.

Mr. BORAH. Not the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia. The Chair is informed that there was a unanimous-consent agreement that the committee amendments should have the first consideration, and there are some committee amendments undisposed of.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on page 3, line 1, after the words "United States," on behalf of the committee I desire to offer an amendment. In the first place, I move to reconsider the committee amendment that has been already agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment on that page was agreed to will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 3 of the Senate print, after the words "United States," I move to strike out the balance of that section and to insert the matter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, in the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out the proviso beginning after the words "United States," on line 1 and ending on line 5 with the words "Secretary of the Treasury," and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That for the purpose of this act rectified distilled spirits shall be construed to be the product obtained by rectification as defined by section 3244, Revised Statutes, except as otherwise provided in this act: Provided further, That the additional tax imposed by this section shall be paid by appropriate stamps prepared, affixed, and canceled in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator from Utah that that is an amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is a very good amendment; but why strike out the word "furnished" and use the word "affixed" in the proviso?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know, except that that is the suggestion of the department. This proviso seems to have been badly drawn originally.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator, without looking up the question, that I take it for granted that the word "furnished" is not necessary, because under the law I suppose that would be done anyhow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the committee to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. On the same page the committee proposes to strike out all of section 2 as printed in the House bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, for that I offer as a substitute the matter which I send to the desk. I want to say that I think there is one slight amendment that should be made to this long amendment; but in the absence of the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who had this matter in charge, I do not desire to make the change. I will offer the substitute as a whole, and then hereafter that amendment can be made.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator offers this as a substitute for the committee amendment found in section 3, as I understand?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is offered, as the Chair understands, as a substitute for section 2.

Mr. SIMMONS. It should be section 3.

Mr. SMOOT. It should be section 3, because section 3 was a substitute by the committee for section 2.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to withdraw that amendment for the present. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] tells me that the Senator from Missouri has asked that it go over for the present.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to say that as a result of an informal conference we had a little while ago I was going to suggest that that matter go over to the end of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to section 2, on page 3. That is one committee amendment that has not yet been passed on.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the wine amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment commencing with line 6, on page 3, and striking out the balance of the page. Does the Senator from North Carolina desire to have that postponed now?

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to substitute for that the amendment that I just sent to the desk and withdrew. I think that can go over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 10, line 8, after the word "sales," I move to insert the words "or transfers"; on the same page, line 10, after the word "sales," I move to insert the words "or transfers"; on the same page, line 12, after the word "sales," I move to insert the words "or transfers"; and on the same page, line 14, after the word "sales," I move to insert the words "or transfers."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 8, in the House text, after the words "annual sales," it is proposed to insert the words "or transfers"; on line 10, after the word "sales," it is proposed to insert the words "or transfers"; on line 12, after the word "sales," it is proposed to insert the words "or transfers"; and on line 14, after the word "sales," it is proposed to insert the words "or transfers."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have here some amendments that relate to Schedule B of the bill. I will offer an amendment to page 42, and then I will go back and offer amendments to other sections of the bill that will be affected by striking out the part that I propose to strike out on page 42.

I move to strike out, on page 42, beginning with line 15, all down to and including line 2 on page 44.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In Schedule B, on page 42, beginning on line 15, it is proposed to strike out all of the proposed committee amendment down to and including line 2 on page 44, in the following words:

Medicinal proprietary articles and preparations: For and upon every packet, box, bottle, pot, or phial, or other inclosure, containing any pills, powders tinctures, troches or lozenges, sirups, cordials, bitters, anodynes, tonics, plasters, liniments, salves, ointments, pastes, drops, waters (except natural spring waters and carbonated or fortified natural spring waters), essences, spirits, oils, and all medicinal preparations or compositions whatsoever, made and sold, or removed for sale, by any person or persons whatever, wherein the person making or preparing the same has or claims to have any private formula, secret, or occult art for the making or preparing the same, or has or claims to have any exclusive right or title to the making or preparing the same, or which are prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed for sale under any letters patent, or trade-mark, or which, if prepared by any formula, published or unpublished, are held out or recommended to the public by the makers, venders, or proprietors thereof as proprietary medicines, or medicinal proprietary articles or preparations, or as remedies or specifics for any disease, or diseases, or affection whatever affecting the human or animal body, as follows: Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall not exceed, at the retail price or value, the sum of 5 cents, one-eighth of 1 cent.

Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of 5 cents and shall not exceed at the retail price or value the sum of 10 cents, two-eighths of 1 cent.

Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of 10 cents and shall not exceed at the retail price or value the sum of 15 cents, three-eighths of 1 cent.

Where each packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of 15 cents and shall not exceed the retail price or value of 25 cents, five-eighths of 1 cent. And for each additional 25 cents of retail price or value or fractional part thereof in excess of 25 cents, five-eighths of 1 cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, does not that schedule relate to the committee amendment found on page 13?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; there are quite a number of amendments that I will offer to make the bill conform to this elimination if it is made.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator now moves to strike out the matter indicated by him and proposes to return to this for the same purpose later on?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not yet understand what the amendment is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the provision of the bill with reference to proprietary articles.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There certainly can be no objection to striking that item out of the bill. It never should have been in the bill at all, and to strike it out does what we have all anticipated might be done by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me understand what the Chair means by the committee amendment as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment originally began in line 15, on page 42, and extended over to and including line 19, on page 46.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is as I understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to that committee amendment, to strike out, beginning with line 15, on page 42, and going over to and including line 2, on page 44, has been agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. Now, I will ask the Senator from North Carolina if he intends to offer any further amendments to the committee amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not to that particular amendment, but I propose to offer quite a number of amendments as to related things in the bill; that is, things that have been placed in the bill since we have stricken out the provision as to proprietary medicines.

Mr. SMOOT. What I meant was, does the Senator intend to make any change in sparkling or other wines which are included in the committee amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I have no amendment as to that.

Mr. SMOOT. Just one moment, Mr. President. [After a pause.] I thought I had an amendment to that particular part of the amendment, but I find I have not, and therefore I have no objection to its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 13, line 4——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the paragraph, beginning in line 3 and including line 9? Let me see if we understand one another. It reads:

And there shall also be levied, collected, and paid, for and in respect to the medicines, preparations, matters, and things mentioned and described in Schedule B of this act, manufactured, sold, or removed for sale—

And so forth.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to have the word "medicines," in line 4, stricken out.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is that all the Senator wishes to have stricken out?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator let us know what that accomplishes?

Mr. SIMMONS. That would leave the other language with reference to cosmetics and perfumery and chewing gum. I wish to strike out the word "medicines," because that applies to the part we have stricken out of Schedule B.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 4, in the proposed committee amendment, strike out the word "medicines" and the comma after the word.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 16, I move to strike out all beginning with line 22 down to and including the words "said stamp," in line 9, page 17, and to insert:

That instead of cancellation by initials and date the stamps on the articles enumerated in Schedule B

The words "shall be" immediately follow.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not understand that.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is just a continuation. The balance of the paragraph remains the same.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The amendment to the amendment comes in before the word "shall," in line 9, on page 17?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; before the word "shall."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 17, line 14, I move to strike out——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the fact that that is a part of the amendment just agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I ask that it be reconsidered. I have another amendment to offer to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the vote agreeing to the amendment as amended will be reconsidered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move to strike out all on page 17, after line 14, and all on page 18, down to and including line 6. The matter I propose to strike out begins with the words, "Any person who shall fraudulently obtain or use any of the aforesaid stamps or designs therefor."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. In the amendment I understand that all penalties are included.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; as to those particular stamps. The stamps we are referring to now, the Senator will see, are where the dies from which they are printed are in the department, so that the department impresses those dies upon the stamp. It is a patented article, and they have some trade-mark. The penalty provision only applies to that character of stamps. If the Senator will turn back, he will see in another part of the bill the penalties are imposed with respect to all other kinds of stamps.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 25, line 18, I move to strike out the word "medicine" and the comma and insert in lieu thereof the words "perfumery, cosmetics," and, in line 19, to strike out the words "including perfumery and cosmetics." That is merely transposing the language.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 26, line 1, after the word "could," I move to strike out the balance of the paragraph, striking out the proviso beginning on line 1 and ending on line 16.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 34, line 21, I move to strike out all after the word "offense" down to and including the word "aforesaid," in line 23.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 31, line 21, after the word "cents," I move to insert:

: Provided, That it is not intended by this act to impose a tax upon an agreement evidencing a deposit of stock certificates as collateral security for money loaned thereon, which stock certificates are not actually sold, nor upon such stock certificates so deposited.

And to strike out the word "Provided," in line 21, and insert "And provided further."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] has an amendment which he desires to offer to this part of the bill.

Mr. SHIVELY. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it a committee amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee accepts the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 34 of the bill, line 14, after the word "Provided," strike out all down to and including the word "shipment," in line 17, and insert:

That a consignment of newspapers to any one point or to different points by the same train or conveyance when inclosed in one general bundle at the point of shipment shall be considered as one shipment, and in lieu of a bill of lading therefor the publisher of such newspaper shall file, on or before the 15th day of each month with the collector of internal revenue for the district in which such newspaper is published, a report, under oath, showing the number of such shipments during the preceding month, to which report such publisher shall affix and cancel stamps equal in value to 1 cent for each shipment so reported: Provided further, That the report herein required shall not include shipments of newspapers delivered to points within the county in which the same are published.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 33, line 22, after the word "court," I move to strike out the period and to insert:

That no bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of such sale, or agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, in case of products or merchandise actually delivered to, and while in vessel, boat, or car, and actually in course of transportation, shall be subject to this tax, provided such bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of such sale, or agreement of sale, or agreement to sell shall be accompanied by bills of lading or vouchers showing that the said products are actually in course of transportation as aforesaid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 39, line 3, after the word "Insurance," I move to strike out the words in parentheses "(marine, inland, fire)."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On the same page, in line 20, after the words "mutual fire insurance companies," I move to insert the words "or associations."

Mr. SMOOT. Is not the word "association" pretty broad? Should it not be reciprocal associations?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not catch the point.

Mr. SMOOT. I was wondering whether the word "association" is not too broad. Ought it not to apply only to reciprocal associations?

Mr. SIMMONS. That means purely cooperative associations.

Mr. THOMAS. The committee uses that word because of some correspondence which it had from one or two sources calling its attention to a number of aggregations, so to speak, of individuals operating sometimes as a sort of joint-stock concern, sometimes as a sort of partnership, and sometimes as an association. To designate each of them would be somewhat cumbersome, and after consulting the dictionary we felt that the word used alone would perhaps cover all these several different sources of aggregations, mutual in their character.

Mr. SMOOT. All I desire is to see that the reciprocal associations are taken care of in this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I think there is no doubt that the word covers it.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was our opinion.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator thinks that covers it, I am satisfied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would explain why an exception is made in favor of purely cooperative or mutual insurance companies. I have received a number of protests against that proposition, and the basis of the argument that has been made is that many of the other companies which provide that all the profits shall be divided among those holding policies are in exactly the same position as these mutual companies; and yet they are to be taxed, while the mutual companies are to be relieved from taxation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Has the Senator noted the fact that the companies relieved here are limited to such as are carrying on business without any profit?

Mr. McCUMBER. If the profits, or what would properly be profits, are placed in an account, which account is to be shared in pro rata by those holding policies, why should a company of that kind be compelled to pay taxes while the other mutual companies of the same character should not pay them?

Mr. SIMMONS. The word "profits" is the dividing line, as the committee thought. It is called a mutual company, or cooperative company, and is doing business upon that line; but if there is a profit realized, all the stockholders ought to pay the tax. If it is mutual in the sense that each one of the members of the association contributes his part toward any loss that may be sustained and there is no surplus for division, we thought that would come within the line of institutions we have habitually in all these bills exempted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would the Senator contend that in the case I have mentioned such a company would be free from taxation, where the only profits would not go to stockholders, but simply, after paying the expenses and the salaries, go entirely to a fund to be divided among the holders of insurance certificates?

Mr. SIMMONS. I should think it would not be a company for profit if the only sum collected in excess of what was necessary to pay the losses was that necessary to keep up the organization and some fund provided for some other purpose in connection with a possible future loss. I should think that was not conducted for profit.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not looked very far into it, but I know there is a great deal of opposition to such a provision.

Mr. SIMMONS. However, I think the class of corporations the committee had in mind were corporations that assess the members no larger sum than is actually necessary to pay the losses and to pay the legitimate expenses of keeping up the organization.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I think the Senator is right with regard to that, but I do not see why an association of that kind should not stamp its premiums just as well as the ordinary stock company. Both of them pay profits, but in one case the profits are returned to the policyholders and in the other they go to the stockholders. The policyholders in the case of the mutual company take the risk of insuring the property of each other. Some of these mutual companies have a very large business, and by reason of the mutuality of their business they are enabled to insure each other at very much less than the ordinary insurance rates, and in many cases return a large part of the premiums to their policyholders at the end of the year. It is purely a business proposition; there is nothing philanthropic about it; they are not charitable associations; they have profits, but the profits they receive are in the shape of a lower cost of insurance upon their properties. There is no reason in the world, it seems to me, why they should be relieved from taxation any more than should the ordinary stock company.

It must be remembered that the cost of this taxation does not fall upon the insurance companies; that it goes back to the policyholders in the end, in the stock companies as well as in the mutual companies. I do not see any reason at all for excepting the mutual companies from taxation in this case. I think that the bill should be amended so as to include all policies of insurance, if we are going to tax any.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the proviso under discussion appears in the revenue act of 1898. It has been followed by the committee only so far as is necessary to cover similar enterprises of a mutual character that are instituted and carried on solely for the protection of the property of the members, and not for profit.

A stock company may, in its general practices, be mutual in its character, but it is nevertheless a stock company. If there be profit, the profit is declared and paid through the medium of stock ownership. Such companies as the Senator from Pennsylvania has suggested, even though they are mutual, are still taxable, notwithstanding this proviso, if they are mutual concerns for profit and if a profit is made and distributed among the members. It is only those which are solely for protection, and not for profit, that are exempted, either as to the proviso embodied in the bill from the act of 1898 or as to the amendment which the committee has inserted in the bill.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. THOMAS. With pleasure.

Mr. OLIVER. I will ask the Senator if he does not acknowledge that in the end this tax will fall upon the policyholders in both cases?

Mr. THOMAS. I think so.

Mr. OLIVER. Then, why relieve the mutual policyholder when you do not relieve the policyholder in the other case?

Mr. THOMAS. We do not relieve the policyholder in the other case unless he makes a profit. If he makes a profit, he must pay the tax. If he does not make a profit, of course he will be within the exemption.

Mr. OLIVER. I can not see the distinction. In one case you charge the policyholder who insures in a regular company with the tax—for it lands on him eventually—and in the other case you relieve the man who joins with a hundred or a thousand other people to mutually insure each other's property.

Mr. THOMAS. It lies in the matter of profit. If that does not exist, of course there is no reason for the distinction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 40, line 1, after the word "insurance," I move to strike out the parentheses and the words "casualty, fidelity, and guaranty."

Mr. SMOOT. Before that amendment is agreed to, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there will be two paragraphs headed "Insurance," and in the index of the bill, when made, it will be very hard to ascertain just what it is. It does seem to me that one of the headings ought to be changed. I think the latter clause ought to be headed: "Insurance, fidelity and guaranty."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask that the first word in the line, "insurance," and the colon before the word "each" be stricken out.

Mr. SMOOT. Also let the semicolon go out, and make this part one paragraph, and then it will be complete.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 40, line 8, after the word "inland," I move to strike out the word "and" after the word "fire" and to insert a comma, and also to strike out the word "insurance," and to insert:

Personal, accident, health, and workmen's compensation insurance carried on by the members thereof solely for their own protection and not for profit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, line 8, it is proposed to strike out the word "and," where it appears before the word "fire," and after the word "fire" to insert a comma, and also to strike out the word "insurance," in the same line, and to insert:

Personal, accident, health, and workmen's compensation insurance carried on by the members thereof solely for their own protection and not for profit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina what class of insurance is now to be caught by this dragnet?

Mr. SIMMONS. This has reference to policies of insurance on bonds or obligations in the nature of indemnity for loss, damage, or liability, issued or executed or renewed by any person, association, or corporation, and so on. It will include a very large class of insurance.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would it extend to bonds which are issued to guarantee the Government against misfeasance in office?

Mr. SIMMONS. Those would be included.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Under what terms? I had very much hoped that they would not be included.

Mr. SIMMONS. It includes:

Each policy of insurance or bond or obligation of the nature of indemnity for loss, damage, or liability, issued or executed——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator think that ought to be included?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not see any reason why a policy of that kind should not pay the tax.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not think that class should pay.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a bond given for the fidelity of the official.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not think any of that class of contracts ought to be taxed.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a matter of policy.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it is very unfortunate that it is done. I am especially sorry that it is proposed to lay the hand of the Government upon any contract of this nature for the purpose of getting revenue.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is exactly the old law, I will say to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly, if I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator was recognized by the Chair and remained standing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, of course, I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina in charge of the bill if the amendment which he has just offered will eliminate from the possibility of taxation any form of cooperative insurance conducted for the benefit of the members without the possibility or the intention of making a profit?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would not like to have to answer offhand a question of that sort. It would be a matter of construction.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask the Senator from North Carolina another question. There is a form of insurance known as the Navy mutual aid insurance It is cooperative insurance, under which the naval officers who belong to the association pay dues, and after their death their families receive, I think, $3,000. Would such insurance be covered by this provision?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The taxation of all life insurance has been stricken from the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the exceptions are life insurance, marine insurance, inland insurance, and fire insurance. This is a different class of insurance. Then there is added to those exceptions personal, accident, health, and workmen's compensation insurance. I think the insurance about which the Senator from Massachusetts is talking would have reference to life insurance, which we struck out altogether.

Mr. WEEKS. Has that been stricken out altogether?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that was stricken out several days ago when the bill was under consideration.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if the effect of the amendment which he has just offered would not be to include life insurance as well as all of the other varieties of insurance named, except when they are cooperative mutual associations, not for profit? The Senator has inserted that clause as qualifying all of these various kinds of insurance, and the effect of that would be to make life insurance taxable, it seems to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. No, Mr. President; there is no term in this section which could possibly be so construed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator read the clause in parentheses as amended by the amendment just adopted?

Mr. SIMMONS. The clause as it is now written in the bill is "except life, marine, inland, and fire insurance."

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is not all. As I understand, the Senator has not read it all. He added as an amendment some words to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will read it all. As the bill is written it excepts life, marine, inland, and fire insurance.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, we have added to those exceptions "personal, accident, health, and workmen's compensation insurance."

Mr. POINDEXTER. But, Mr. President, in order to get the effect of that provision you have to read it all together. If the Senator from North Carolina will read the amendment as amended, he will see what the effect of it will be.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will do that, if the Senator desires me to do so. It would read:

> Except life, marine, inland, fire, personal, accident, health, and workmen's compensation insurance, carried on by the members thereof solely for their own protection, and not for profit.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now, the Senator must see, from what he has just read, that that would subject life insurance to taxation in all of those cases where the business is not carried on solely for their own protection and not for profit.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The word "life" ought to go out.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the word "life" ought to go out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Having stricken life insurance out of the bill, we also ought to strike this language out.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is right, that the word "life" ought to go out.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood the intention of the Senator was to do that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask to modify the amendment in that respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he intends to exempt life insurance from taxation?

Mr. SIMMONS. We have done that. We have eliminated from the bill the entire section with reference to life insurance.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I had overlooked the fact that we eliminated that.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will turn back to page 38, he will see a provision there for life insurance, but by an amendment, agreed to when this bill was previously under consideration, that section of the House bill was eliminated.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask a further question of the Senator from North Carolina. As the bill was reported from the committee, in the parentheses which the Senator has just moved to amend, not only life but marine, inland, and fire insurance are excepted from the effects of the paragraph.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is it the Senator's intention to include marine, inland, and fire insurance in the provision and make them subject to taxation except where the companies issuing the policies are mutual and not conducted for profit?

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the effect of the amendment which the Senator has proposed.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will see that on the preceding page we have provided for marine, inland, and fire insurance.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the very reason, it seems to me, they ought not to be included in this paragraph. The effect of the Senator's amendment is to include them except where such companies are mutual and not conducted for profit.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the effect is to except them, not to include them.

Mr. POINDEXTER. When the Senator inserts an exception of a specific variety of insurance, which is mutual and not for profit, he necessarily includes all those that are for profit.

Mr. SIMMONS. No, Mr. President; what this section was intended to do was to except from the operation of this particular paragraph marine, inland, fire, and workmen's compensation insurance.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, I thought that was the Senator's intention; but that is not the effect of the amendment which he has offered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator has just admitted that the amendment which he offered would include life insurance, and for the same reason it would include all these other kinds of insurance.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator uses the word "include" in a different sense from that in which I use it. I use it as meaning that it would include fire, marine, and other insurance in the exception clause of the paragraph. Life insurance has been stricken out.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What kind of insurance does the Senator mean to qualify by the phrase "mutual and not for profit"?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will carefully read that paragraph, I think he will see what kind. We intended to include workmen's compensation insurance. This exception as now framed by the amendment would have reference to things that might be covered under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that he would carry out his meaning if he would say "except life, marine, inland, and fire insurance of any kind whatever, and workmen's compensation insurance where the company is not conducted for profit, but solely for mutual protection."

Mr. TOWNSEND. Or if the Senator would leave it as it is in the parentheses——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If I understand the Senator correctly, the object he has in mind would be carried out by leaving the words in the parentheses as they are, and adding "and except also," and then go on with the other sentence. That would make it apply simply to what you add and to that which is already in parentheses.

Mr. SIMMONS. That states it a little more clearly. The mutual workmen's compensation insurance companies thought they might be embraced in this provision unless they were expressly excepted from it; and, in response to their suggestion, we put in the exception.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The words just preceding the parenthesis are "or other branch of insurance"; so that, although the preceding language to that language expressed certain kinds of insurance, the broad language following it, "or other branch of insurance," would, if we did not put in the parentheses, have included every other form of insurance not at some other place in the bill expressly excluded. In that connection I want to say that the word "life" ought to be reinserted in the bill. I understand that was stricken out a moment ago.

Mr. STONE. We did not strike it out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The object of this bill is to strike out from taxation all personal accident insurance, all health insurance, and all workmen's compensation insurance of a certain character.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What character?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi is absolutely right about it. The word "life" was stricken out inadvertently. I did not at the minute when the Senator suggested to me that it be stricken out advert to the three preceding words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary advises the Chair that the amendment striking out the word "life" has not been agreed to; it was merely a suggestion; the Senate has not acted upon it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it has not been agreed to, all that is necessary for the Senator from North Carolina to do is to withdraw the motion to strike out the word "life," or not make it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I withdraw it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Washington asked me what sort of workmen's compensation is included in this sentence. I will ask the Senator from North Carolina to read the language following the words "workmen's compensation insurance."

Mr. SIMMONS. The words are "workmen's compensation insurance carried on by members thereof solely for their own protection and not for profit." If the Senator will examine the language the Senator from Mississippi calls attention to, and which for the moment I did not advert to, he will see why this exception is put in just at that point. It is to meet the possible inference that might be drawn from the words "or other branch of insurance" and to make it clear that by the words "other branch of insurance" we do not intend to include life insurance, and so on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from North Carolina now state the amendment as he would have it submitted to the Senate?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have already stated it, and I think the Secretary has it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I only desire to repeat, Mr. President, that while the Senator claims he is excepting these various kinds of insurance he is really including them by implication by force of the amendment which he has offered.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is mistaken. We simply say in parentheses that we do not mean by the use of the words "other branch of insurance" to refer to the branches mentioned in the exception; that is all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is only one branch the Senator includes, and that is where the insurance is carried on for profit.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it means other branches of insurance of like kind, the kind of insurance enumerated above.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Where it is carried on by the members thereof for their own protection and not for profit. Unless it is qualified by that phrase, then it is not excepted. I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina why include any life insurance in this tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. None is included.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Or any class of insurance, such as fire insurance? Why do you include insurance at all as the subject of a special extraordinary tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator mean fire insurance?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; fire insurance or accident insurance or marine insurance.

Mr. SIMMONS. Fire insurance is included. We put a tax upon policies of fire insurance and inland insurance, but we have not anywhere in the bill placed a tax on insurance on life. We are seeking to safeguard the possibility of any language employed in the bill being susceptible of a construction that it would include insurance on life or accident or health.

The Senator asked me, Why impose a tax on insurance policies, such as fire insurance? I do not think I need to say more about that than that I can see no reason why they should not pay a tax along with other things of like kind that are included in this bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Fire insurance is regarded generally as one of the necessary incidents of business and of the ownership of property.

Mr. SIMMONS. And so are deeds of conveyance, so are promissory notes, and so are a hundred—I will not say a hundred, but a score—of other things mentioned in this bill. I can think myself of no reason why policies of fire insurance should not be included. That part of the bill is an exact copy, I think, of the old law.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems to me, Mr. President, that there must be some emergency in the mind of the chairman of the committee that the country does not know anything about that would justify levying a tax upon fire insurance or upon any insurance against loss of property.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that this provision is taken bodily from the act of 1898 and from the war-tax act of the Civil War.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator makes a comparison——

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not care to argue that question with the Senator; he can argue it if he desires so to do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not want the Senator to argue it with me; I was only asking him a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I merely expressed my opinion that it was a proper subject of taxation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not requesting the Senator to argue the matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator does not understand me as desiring to be at all curt about the matter. That was not my idea. I meant to say that I had stated all I cared to say about the matter, unless the Senator desires to ask me some other question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator made a statement comparing the conditions justifying the tax now proposed and the reason and necessity for it with the conditions that existed when the United States was involved in a flagrant war of unknown proportions. The country was threatened with a descent on the great, rich cities of the Atlantic coast by the Spanish war fleet. Nobody knew what they could do or what their power was; but from the past history of that country we supposed that they were able to do a great many things which events showed they were not able to do. It was, however, under that stress, in a state of actual war, that that tax was levied. Now the Senator says that, because we levied such a tax under those conditions, we are justified in doing so now in a period of profound peace.

Mr. SIMMONS. What the Senator is saying applies to the whole bill as much as it does to this particular section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington yields the floor. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington says that when the original act of 1898, from which most of this bill is copied, was passed by the Republican Party the country was "in a state of stress" and that now we are in "profound peace." That is literally true; but in spirit it is thoroughly inaccurate. The stress to which the country was subjected during the Spanish-American War was absolutely nothing compared to the stress to which the country is subjected right now. The effect of the continental war in Europe has been ten times as damaging to the United States as the Spanish-American War, in which they themselves were engaged. So that, if the stress and the emergency in 1898 justified the provisions of this law then, the greater stress and the greater Treasury emergency justifies a part of it now. The mere accident that we are not parties to the war—a big war—when we were at that time parties to what was, in comparison, a play war, or, at any rate, a little war, has nothing to do with the question. That is my answer to the Senator's remarks.

Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. WEEKS addressed the Chair.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, I am asking these questions in the utmost friendliness and not in any party spirit at all. I have a great deal of respect for the judgment and the accuracy of reasoning of the Senator from Mississippi; but I am greatly surprised that, with his candor of reasoning and sincerity of thought and expression, he can satisfy himself with the answer just made, that there is any such stress—or a much greater stress, as he has said—upon the United States to-day, justifying the levy of extraordinary and burdensome taxes upon the occupations and the business instruments of the people, as compared to what there was in 1898, when the honor and territorial integrity and, so far as we knew, the very existence of the Nation were at stake on account of the war.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to remind the Senator from Washington that the emergency in 1898 was not enough to enlist at that time the sympathy and cooperation of the Senator from Mississippi in the passage of the bill that he cites as a precedent.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why, Mr. President, everybody knows the wave of enthusiasm and deep, intense feeling that swept over this country in 1898 when war was declared, and young men throughout the country were crowding the recruiting offices in order to offer their services and their lives in defense of the country; and the same feeling permeated the business world. Everyone was anxious to do his share to bear the burden of that war in taxes or in personal sacrifice. They do not feel that way now, however, because there is no such emergency existing.

If we levy a tax when we are at war, even though it be a little war, as the Senator characterizes that one, it will meet with the approval of the people and their willing acquiescence. They will be eager to support the finances of the Government when we are at war; but there is no sophistry of reasoning which will enable the Senator to come in here now, when there is no war, and justify a tax as a war tax.

The Senator can make a very plausible argument as to the stress under which the country is laboring now. We have different opinions upon what that stress is and the extent of it. I see a great many indications that this country, in a business and financial way, instead of being under a stress on account of this unfortunate and horrible European war, is going to profit very greatly by it, and is profiting by it, and will profit much more in the future by it. How the Senator can liken our present condition to a condition of war is not very clear to me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have never said that "the honor of the country" was at stake now, as it was in 1898. I have said that the Treasury emergency and the general stress and strain of industry and finance now were greater than they were in 1898. The idea of "the existence of the Nation being at stake" when we went to war with Spain! There was no human being who ever dreamt that the existence of this Nation was at stake when we went to war with Spain. So much for that; but there was a question of honor.

What I say, however, is that the emergency now is five times as great; that the dislocation of industry is from three to five to ten times as great, and the same thing is true as to the dislocation of commerce and of exchange. As far as the effect of the Spanish-American War upon our Treasury was concerned, and the effect of this war upon our Treasury, the effect of this war upon our Treasury has been manyfold greater.

Why, the Spanish-American War did not interfere with our imports in the slightest degree; the Senator from Washington and I both know that; while we both know that this war has cut off our imports, which were revenue breeders, from Germany, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, and France, to a large extent from Russia, and to some extent from Great Britain, and slightly further from all the world.

What is the emergency that justifies a new tax? It is an emergency in the Treasury—a threatened deficit. There was no emergency in the Treasury in 1898 except the emergency caused by the necessity of raising revenue to prepare an army for the field. That was upon the side of expenditures. The emergency now is upon the side of receipts. I say to the Senator in all due candor that the State of Mississippi alone, as far as industry, commerce, exchange, and fiscal arrangements are concerned, has already suffered more in these two months and a half of the European war than this entire country suffered in the whole course of the Spanish-American War.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Mississippi that the country has suffered more from this war than it did from the war of 1898, but there is a great difference between the country suffering and the Government suffering. The purpose of this revenue bill is to raise income for the Government——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator confess that the Treasury has suffered, by the loss of import duties, more from this war than it did from the war of 1898?

Mr. LIPPITT. How much has the income of the Government suffered?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I read the figures here the other day; $5,000,000 in eight days, I believe, in one place.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will read the Senator the figures.

Mr. LIPPITT. I wish the Senator would read them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will read the Senator the falling off during the first 12 days.

Mr. LIPPITT. Of what?

Mr. SIMMONS. The falling off in imports.

Mr. LIPPITT. For the first 12 days of what?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of October.

Mr. LIPPITT. What was the falling off in revenue of the Government for the month of September? Has the Senator that?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not that at my fingers' ends right now.

Mr. LIPPITT. Then, if the Senator will excuse me, I will go on with what I was going to say.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that the falling off in revenue during the first 12 days of October amounted to $8,731,000. I think it was about $9,000,000 in the month of September.

Mr. LIPPITT. The recollections of the Senator from North Carolina and myself agree. I have not here the exact figures for the month of September, but I will refer to them in a minute.

I started to say to the Senator from Mississippi when I rose, but was not allowed to finish the sentence, that the present revenue bill was a bill for the purpose of relieving the Treasury of the United States; that I agreed with the Senator from Mississippi that the people of the country had suffered more from this war than they had from the war of 1898, but that what the people suffered and what the Government suffered in its revenue were two entirely different matters.

As I understand the present situation, it is that in the month of September there was something like $9,000,000 less revenue from customs than there was in the same month of the previous year; but Mr. UNDERWOOD, in his report upon this bill, admits that the falling off in revenue under the existing tariff law amounted to about $4,000,000 per month; and therefore, for the month of September, the falling off in the revenues of the Government due to the war was about five and a half million dollars; or, in other words, at the rate of sixty-five to seventy million dollars a year. It is now proposed, on the basis of those figures, to assess——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield, and to whom?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield first to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from Rhode Island that the revenues derived under the Underwood-Simmons bill for the 10 months beginning with October, 1913, up to the 1st of August, 1914, before the war was declared, showed a deficiency of over $30,000,000 as compared with what we had raised from customs the preceding year under the old tariff law, or an average loss of over $3,000,000 per month during the 10 months preceding the war.

Mr. LIPPITT. I think the Senator is mistaken. I think they showed a loss of about $4,000,000 a month. The Senator undoubtedly has on his desk the report of the chairman of the Finance Committee on this very subject.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LIPPITT. Just a minute. If the Senator from Minnesota will refer to page 7 of that report he will see that Mr. UNDERWOOD admits that the falling off in revenue averaged about $4,000,000 a month, and that those figures have been reprinted and accepted by the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate. So I am going to use those figures, as having that very substantial authority, in the few remarks I am about to make.

I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island alluded to the loss of $9,000,000 of revenue in the month of September. Is it not a fact that during the month of September, 1913, large quantities of merchandise were held in bond in anticipation of a reduction of duties following the passage of the then existing tariff bill?

Mr. LIPPITT I think very likely that was the situation; but, for the purpose of completing what I thought were going to be a very few words that I was about to say, I am perfectly willing to base my remarks upon the figures for the month of September.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wish to say to the Senator that the total falling off in customs revenues during the fiscal year 1914 amounted to about $26,000,000, in round figures. For the months of July, August, September, and 13 days of October of this year, being 3 months and 13 days, there has been already a falling off of $34,365,000, or about $8,000,000 more for these three months and less than a half month than the total falling off during the fiscal year 1914.

Mr. LIPPITT. Do I understand the Senator from North Carolina to be making the argument that the sole reason for the enactment of this revenue bill is the decrease in the customs revenue resulting from the war?

Mr. SIMMONS. The reason for the enactment of this bill is the certainty, as we see it, of a loss of customs receipts, resulting from the curtailment of foreign importations, which will aggregate at least $100,000,000. My own impression is that it will aggregate a great deal more than $100,000,000, because instead of our imports increasing, I think they are going to continue to decrease until they are very much smaller than has been anticipated. As soon as Europe has sent us the accumulated stock of merchandise that she had on hand when the war began, I do not think there will be any sources from which she can draw for the purposes of foreign exportation to amount to anything.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to ask the Senator if this $107,000,000 is to be raised for the sole purpose of meeting the deficiency caused by the war situation, when or in what form he proposes to bring in a bill to meet the deficiency in revenue that will be caused by the excessive expenditures for which this Congress has provided?

Mr. SIMMONS. There have been no excessive expenditures; but I do not desire to go into a discussion of that matter.

The situation is this, if the Senator will permit me: We were getting so much revenue from our customhouse. That revenue, under normal conditions, added to the revenue from internal-revenue taxes and income taxes, was amply sufficient to support the Government. Last year it not only supported it, but it left a surplus of $34,000,000.

Mr. LIPPITT. Oh, yes; but last year you had a much less expensive Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, we are confronted with a falling off of imports, from which alone we can receive receipts through the customhouse, and that falling off, during the first 3 months and 13 days of this fiscal year, has been $34,000,000, as against $26,000,000 resulting from the decrease in tariff duties during the fiscal year of 1914. As we are facing a loss of $100,000,000 in our customs receipts, this is simply to take the place of that loss, and to replenish the Treasury for the money that it will not get because the imports will not come in.

Mr. LIPPITT. Before the Senator takes his seat I hope he will answer the question which I asked him—how he expects to provide for the increased appropriations that have been made by this Congress over the estimated income of the Government?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that the revenues that will be received, with the sum we are now proposing to raise to recoup the losses sustained from the falling off in imports, will be abundantly sufficient to pay all of the appropriations that this Congress has made; and if the war had not come on the ordinary receipts from the customhouse and the internal revenue would have been amply sufficient for that purpose.

When the Senator talks about the "great appropriations" we have made this year, I want to tell him that the appropriations we have made during this Congress for the next fiscal year exceed the appropriations that were made for the last fiscal year by only about $9,000,000, as I now recall; and we paid the appropriations for the last fiscal year with the receipts raised by our system of taxation and had $34,000,000 left.

Mr. LIPPITT. Does the Senator include the Panama expenditures in that statement?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Panama expenditures are not included in that statement. The Panama expenditures are not a part of the ordinary appropriations. They have not been considered at any time a part of them. We provided for the issue of bonds out of which to pay them. After we had made the other appropriations, if we had a sufficient amount of money left in the Treasury to pay the expenses of constructing the Panama Canal in that year we took that money to pay those expenses, instead of issuing the bonds that a previous Congress had provided might be issued for the construction of the canal. Last year, fortunately, after we had paid all of the ordinary expenses of the Government and met every appropriation that Congress had made, we had enough left to pay all the expenses of constructing the Panama Canal; and we took the surplus and applied it to that purpose, instead of issuing those bonds.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] has the floor.

Mr. LIPPITT. I want to ask the Senator from North Carolina, now that he has gone into this question, whether it is not a fact that the estimate of the Treasury Department of the United States, which gives the figures which the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House used in a very elaborate report which he made about two weeks ago upon the financial situation, did not show that the estimated revenues of the Government would be about $50,000,000 short of the appropriations that had already been made?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not read that, and I do not know what it shows. I know, however, that the appropriations of the last fiscal year were $1,098,000,000. I know that the appropriations up to the time we made that report this year were $1,089,000,000. I know that the river and harbor bill has been passed since that time, which would run up the total to $20,000,000 more, which would make a total of $1,109,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The total appropriations up to date, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, are one billion one hundred and fifteen million six hundred and some odd thousand dollars.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know where the Senator from Utah gets his figures.

Mr. SMOOT. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is right back of the Senator. I will ask him if the figures I have given are not correct?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the Senator from Virginia tells me that that is correct; so that it amounts to $7,000,000 more than I had stated; but I was adding the $20,000,000 for rivers and harbors to the $1,089,000,000 referred to in Mr. FITZGERALD'S statement.

I want to say to the Senator from Rhode Island that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] discussed all of these questions most elaborately here on yesterday, and if the Senator would stay in the Senate Chamber and hear these debates we would not have to go over the same ground every day.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have no doubt the Senator would much prefer not to have me go over it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no; I do not care about the Senator's going over it, except in the interest of saving time.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator would go back and read what was said the other day, that would save time. Since he does not stay here to hear it, he might at least read it in the RECORD.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to say to the Senator from Missouri that I have read in the RECORD much of what has been said on this subject.

Mr. STONE. The Senator is now covering exactly the same ground again.

Mr. LIPPITT. I suppose I have a perfect right to do so——

Mr. STONE. Oh, the Senator has an absolute right to do so.

Mr. LIPPITT. Without having the Senator from Missouri undertake the task of telling me what I may or may not do in this body.

Mr. STONE. Oh, the Senator can say anything he pleases. I do not care.

Mr. LIPPITT. Now, that we have cleared up that situation, with the kind permission of the Senator I will go ahead and try to say the one or two sentences that I started to say when I first rose.

Mr. STONE. Well, go ahead, and for God's sake get through with it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator from Missouri will kindly stay and listen to me, I think he might learn something.

Mr. STONE. No; I can not learn anything from the Senator from Rhode Island, because I do not think he can convey any information to the Senate that it has not now; but he is a good waster of time.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator from Missouri has great confidence in his supreme knowledge on various subjects, but I venture to say that possibly the Senator from Rhode Island may at some time convey some information to the Senate, and perhaps he has done so in the past. I certainly have listened a great deal to what the Senator from Missouri has had to say on various subjects, and I can not say that I remember any extraordinary amount of information that has come from that source. [Laughter.]

Mr. STONE. That may be true. I think the Senator from Rhode Island might convey information on some subjects.

Mr. LIPPITT. I am very glad the Senator admits that.

Mr. STONE. He might convey information on this subject if the whole thing had not been debated and debated here for days, until it was made threadbare, in the Senator's absence. Now, he comes here to waste hours again in beating over the same old straw. That is what I am objecting to.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not think I have talked as long as the Senator from Missouri has on this subject. I started to say one or two sentences, and the Senators on that side of the Chamber immediately wished to take my time, which I have been perfectly willing to have them do, and yielded willingly and kindly to them; but I think it is scarcely fair to come back and claim that I am using the time of the Senate, when perhaps, if there had been a careful record kept of the clock, it would have been found that somebody else had been using it.

All I started to say was this: The Senator from Mississippi was referring to the stress which was caused by the war in this country, and he was apparently justifying the tax which is now being levied by the fact that there was greater suffering and stress in this country, due to the situation the present war has caused, than that which resulted from the situation during the war of 1898.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A greater Treasury emergency.

Mr. LIPPITT. What I wished to say to him was that the emergency of the war of 1898 was entirely a Treasury emergency; that the tax which was levied at that time was for the sole purpose of reimbursing the Treasury; that there was a great strain upon the Treasury, because it was put to extraordinary expenses on account of the war; and that it seemed to me like a very curious argument to advance that because the people of this country were suffering in an extraordinary manner from the disasters that have been caused by this war, the Democratic Party should also want to add to that suffering a tax of $107,000,000. It seemed to me that the suffering they were undergoing was quite great enough, without adding to it the additional and onerous burden of a tax about one-half of which, I think, from the figures I have seen, is not due at all to the war, but is due to the extravagant and unparalleled expenditures which the Democratic Congress has made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, what I said was that this bill was as much justified by the fiscal and Treasury exigencies as the bill of 1898, in which was contained the language criticized by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

Now, let me see. This bill proposes to raise $100,000,000 of extra revenue. The falling off of customs receipts in the first month of this war—the month of August—was $11,000,000. The falling off in September, the second month of this war—I am giving round figures—was $9,000,000. The two added together make $20,000,000.

Mr. LIPPITT. May I be allowed to interrupt the Senator at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me get through with the sum in arithmetic; I have not finished the sentence. To go back and repeat, then, so that the Senator may catch it: In August, the first month of this war, the falling off was $11,000,000; in September, the second month of the war, it was $9,000,000, or a total of $20,000,000. In the half month, or nearly half month—it is not quite a half month—of October which is past, it was $8,750,000. Now, there is a total of twenty-eight and three-quarter million dollars of loss of revenue at the customhouses in two months and a half.

The Democratic Party therefore concluded that if there would be a corresponding fall in the revenue for the balance of the year, at least $100,000,000 would be needed to cover the threatened deficit. These are all comparisons between the revenue of the two and a half months in this year and of the last year. Now, if the country suffered a loss of customs receipts because of the falling off of importations in two months and a half of the war of twenty-eight and three-quarter million dollars, it would suffer five times that much in a year.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will not the Senator deduct something from that falling off owing to the fact that the tariff law his party has passed also very largely reduced the revenue for each of the preceding months that it has been in existence. The Senator does not propose to assume that the entire falling off in revenues is due to the war?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not assuming it.

Mr. LIPPITT. Then——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a minute. There would be a total falling off of $114,000,000.

Mr. LIPPITT. Now, Mr. President, if——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a minute——

Mr. LIPPITT. The report of Mr. UNDERWOOD claims that at least an average of $4,000,000 a month was due to the tariff law. That is at the rate, if we are going to use the Senator's figures, of $48,000,000 a year. The Senator says that the war cost to the Government so far has been $114,000,000, and the total revenue fall is at the rate of $114,000,000 a year. If we deduct $48,000,000 from $114,000,000, it leaves somewhere in the neighborhood of $70,000,000, and if the lack of revenue by reason of the war is $70,000,000, which is the outside that these figures show, why should we raise a tax of $110,000,000 except for the fact that the report of the Treasury shows that that was the deficit?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, I hope I will have the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island. Twenty-eight million dollars in two and a half months is about $140,000,000 a year. I said a moment ago $114,000,000. It is $140,000,000. That is the falling off. Now, the $4,000,000 a month, assuming that figure to be correct for argument's sake, or $48,000,000 was from the fact that we reduced taxes upon the people by putting various things upon the free list——

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator does not mean to say that we reduced the taxes upon the people. What he means to say is that we changed the form of taxes on the people and reduced the revenue from that source.

Mr. WILLIAMS. However fine a user of English the Senator from Rhode Island may be, I prefer to select my own phraseology. Now, suppose $48,000,000 of that amount resulted from our removing tariff taxes from the backs and bellies of the people by putting various things upon the free list and by reducing tariff taxes upon other things; deducting that left $92,000,000, and this bill, calculated to raise $100,000,000, will leave us a margin only of $8,000,000. I say we have not raised revenue too much; that, if anything, we have raised it too little in this bill. Why? Because in my opinion the importations are going to continue to grow less rather than greater, and the customs receipts are therefore going to continue to grow less rather than greater, and the total revenues therefore to diminish, unless made up by an increase from other sources. The only excuse for not providing more revenue in this bill is that we are going to meet again in December, and if we find that our present diagnosis of the case is not correct, then we can bring in another bill to meet the increased deficit.

In all this I have admitted for the sake of argument the Senator's contention of a falling off in customs revenues from those which would have been collected under the Dingley bill of $48,000,000 per annum. When we framed the Underwood-Simmons bill we calculated upon and provided for a decrease of $50,000,000 in customs receipts. This decrease was a decrease of the burden of taxation, which otherwise would have rested on all the people, and principally upon the poor, least able to stand it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Mississippi is very frank in his statement as to the loss of revenue from customs. Would he not be equally frank and admit that your calculation with reference to the amount you expected to derive from the income and corporation tax was very disappointing also?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will pardon me just one sentence more, I think it was stated here that you expected to raise $122,000,000 from the corporation and income tax. It has turned out that you have raised $71,000,000. That is not chargeable to any war in Europe, but it is chargeable to miscalculation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am not a muzzle-loading shotgun which scatters at the breach. When I get up to talk about one question I do not undertake at the same time to talk about every other question in the world. I have denied the statement of the Senator, but do not care to argue it. I wish to stick to my text. I am talking now about the falling off in receipts from customs duties and the necessity of supplying that deficit. Whether we made a miscalculation with regard to the income and corporation tax or not has nothing to do with the case, any more than "the flowers that bloom in the spring," because of the very simple fact that our income tax, plus internal revenue, plus customs, plus other and miscellaneous sources of revenue, were bringing in enough to pay the expenses of the Government, and more than enough, even with somewhat extravagant appropriations. Now, if we made a mistake, it was a very lucky thing that we made it; otherwise we would have piled up more money in the Treasury than ought to have been piled up. But that has nothing to do with this question. I want to drive this question right down to its point, and that is whether there exists no Treasury exigency, actual or threatened, to justify this tax.

If the Senator from Michigan be right, there exists a greater emergency than I thought. It does not make a bit of difference why the emergency, why the deficit exists; there is that much money needed to be raised by taxation, and the Democratic Party can not justify itself before the country unless it can show that that much more money is needed. I say, and the facts prove, that the falling off of revenue receipts to the extent of $100,000,000 per year is the cause of the threatened deficit, and that the war is the cause of that falling off.

I say that the cause of its being needed was the falling off in imports. The Senator from Michigan may say that it was for any other reason he pleases, but I say it is from the falling off of imports, and this falling off of imports for the entire year, if calculated at the rate of two and a half times $28,000,000, will be $140,000,000 for a year.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. So we justify the raising of $100,000,000 by special taxes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to just what happened in August as the result of the falling off in imports. The Senator will agree with me that there was a falling off of $8,000,000 in August.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In August?

Mr. WEEKS. In August.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There was a falling off of $11,000,000.

Mr. WEEKS. Eight million dollars in imports and $11,400,000 in revenue. Those are the correct figures, taken from the Treasury statement. Now, of that $11,400,000 revenue loss due to importations—I have the exact figures here—$9,727,000 was due to the reduction in duties and only $1,776,000 could be charged to the reduction in the importations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator can not make that.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator can convince himself that any of those figures are not correct, I would be glad to have him do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is very easy to take a thing formerly on the dutiable list and figure out a certain rate, and calculate the rate it would have been, but that is wrapping things in a mere cloud of obscurity and has nothing to do with this case. The sole thing here, the point to which I want to pin the matter down, is that we provided a revenue for this country from several sources, and in one particular regard, to wit, the customs part of that revenue, there will be a failure of $140,000,000 during this year below our former year's receipts and nearly, if not quite, $100,000,000 below our correct calculation, based on peace conditions, and our therefore first expectation. That is all.

Every other argument concerning it all is aliunde, irrelevant, or obtuse.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, it is very refreshing to me, and I presume it will be to the taxpayers of this country to have the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], a member of the Finance Committee of the Senate, inform us that this bill is only a starter and that when Congress meets in December we may look for still another addition to the burdens of the taxpayers of the country.

I do not think it is exactly fair, Mr. President, for the chairman of the Finance Committee and the Senator from Mississippi to hold up the first 12 days of this month for a comparison, comparing the revenues for the first half of this month with the same period last year, because they well know that immediately following the enactment of the present tariff bill on the 3d of October last year there was entered at the customhouses an enormous quantity of goods which had been held in bond, and that the revenues for the early part of October last year were largely in excess of normal revenues for that period. I have not the figures at hand to show exactly what they were, but the revenues for October, 1913, were largely in excess of the ordinary revenues for October, and the customs revenues for the first 12 days of this month do not by any means fall to the extent of $12,000,000 below ordinary and normal revenues for the same period in any ordinary year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not think that the Senate ought to take any Senator's opinion when we have the daily statement of the United States Treasury before us showing the exact conditions of Government receipts.

I simply want to call attention to this fact, and it is a fact, that on October 12, 1914, the receipts of the Government as compared with the receipts of the Government a year ago upon the same date show a loss of only $14,497,916.67, or, in other words, that the Government of the United States received from all sources during this fiscal year, from June 30 until October 12, as much money as they did the last fiscal year, with the exception of $14,497,916.67. Mr. President, that includes the shortage of customs revenues from October 1 to October 12 of $8,731,000.23. So all that the Government starts out with on the 12th day of October by way of shortage of receipts from a year ago amount, as I stated, to $14,497,916.67.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator from Utah what would have been the amount of revenue paid into the Treasury on the identical importations at the rate in force under the Payne-Aldrich law?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator means for the full year?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; for the period the Senator is now criticizing during which the Underwood law was in operation. What would have been the difference? Why does the Senator attribute it to the low rate fixed in the Democratic tariff law without comparing it with the revenue that would have been derived had the importations taken place under the Payne-Aldrich law?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I can give the Senator the figures he wants.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is immaterial from what source I get them, so that they are reliable.

Mr. NELSON. From the 1st of October, 1913, three days before the tariff bill was passed, up to the 1st of August this year the total revenue amounted to $229,461,767, and for the same months of the preceding year under the former tariff law the total revenue was $260,122,137. It is the difference between $229,000,000 and $260,000,000.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. But that does not answer the question that I intended to ask. Assuming that the same identical articles were imported under the Payne-Aldrich law that were imported under the present tariff law, what would have been the revenue paid into the United States Treasury? We must know that, it seems to me, before we can say that the reduced rates in the present tariff law are responsible for the smaller amount of revenue received.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course I do not want to make a statement that I can not prove by the Treasury Department, as the Senator knows, but I can make an estimate of the amount, and that is all that anyone can do unless he took the items imported and compared them under the two laws. I will say to the Senator that the amount of goods imported under the Payne-Aldrich law for the first 11 months——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. They may have been entirely different goods.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I stated to the Senator.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Different articles bear different rates, and if you want to institute a comparison it ought to be on the same units.

Mr. SMOOT. I just stated that that is true, but I want to say to the Senator the average rate under the Payne-Aldrich Act was about 44 per cent and the average rate under the Underwood Act is about 26 per cent. So the only way by which we could come to any reasonable conclusion as to the amount would be by using the two averages. But I will say to the Senator, as I stated before, I could not give the exact figures until I saw just the items that were imported, the quantities imported, and the rates that they carried under one law and the other.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Does not the Senator think it will be necessary to have that information before we can intelligently and justly criticize the present law with having resulted in a reduced collection of revenue?

Mr. SMOOT. No; because of the fact we all know what the reduced revenue is. There is not any question about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has made some quotations from the Treasury statement of receipts and disbursements during this fiscal year as compared with the last fiscal year. The Senator will discover that the customs receipts submitted by the Treasury Department for the past fiscal year were $99,725,000 in round figures. The customs receipts as given by the department this year were $65,333,000, making a difference in the customs receipts for this period as compared with those of last year of $34,000,000. Now, the Senator in order to reach the results he just now gave confused in his computation the miscellaneous items. The miscellaneous items for the last fiscal year were $13,856,000 in round numbers. This year the amount was $26,191,000, being considerably more, but the difference was owing to the price we received from the two ships that we sold.

Mr. SMOOT. That is absolutely true, Mr. President, and that does not dispute anything I stated.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am simply making the statement to show exactly what were the receipts this year as compared with those of last year.

In the last two months we have received quite a considerable increase from internal revenue. That resulted, as everybody knows, from the large sales of whisky during those months, arising from the apprehension of the holders that a tax would be imposed upon whisky. Therefore they have drawn it rapidly out of the warehouses, and the receipts from that source have increased. But when you come to customhouse receipts there can be no question that the customhouse receipts last year for the three months of July, August, and September, and for the first 12 days of October, amounted, as I said, to $99,000,000, lacking only $25,000 of a hundred million dollars; but this year they have amounted during the same period to only $65,303,000. I did not desire to make any argument, but merely to make that statement.

Now, if the Senator from Utah will pardon me, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island——

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator leaves that point——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought I had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought the Senator had yielded.

Mr. SMOOT. I did yield the floor to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought the Senator from Utah had yielded before the Senator from North Carolina began.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in this connection I merely want to make one further observation, and that is, that every argument that has been made upon the other side as to the reduction of tariff duties is based upon the receipts from the Payne-Aldrich Act. When the new law was passed it was passed with the understanding that the receipts would be less under the Democratic law. Everybody admitted it. There was an income tax imposed to make up that deficiency. So the comparison is not fair. The only just comparison is to take the revenues of the Government as expected from the Underwood Act, including the revenues from the income tax and from every other source.

The Senator from North Carolina was perfectly right in what he said in relation to the falling off of the customs duties by some $34,000,000 so far in this fiscal year; but the receipts from all sources up to the 12th day of this month, as compared with those of a year ago, with all that was collected under the Payne-Aldrich rates, amounted, as I said before, to only $14,497,916.67. On the 12th day of October this Government started out with that difference in its receipts from what they were a year ago, and no less. That is what we ought to figure upon, and that is all we ought to take into consideration up to that day in passing the revenue bill. I do not believe anybody will attempt to dispute that fact, and I know it can not be successfully disputed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply wish to add to what I have already said a brief statement. We did, as the Senator from Utah observes, calculate that there would be a falling off in revenue as the result of the reduction in tariff duties. There was a falling off, as a matter of fact, in the last fiscal year of $26,000,000. That was less than we expected; we expected it would be more than that; but with that falling off during the last fiscal year the receipts from customs, supplemented by the receipts from the income tax and the internal revenue, were sufficient to pay the expenses of the Government. Now, already, in a little over three months, there has been a falling off of customs duties during this fiscal year of about $8,000,000 more than we lost during the whole of the fiscal year 1914. If that proportion of falling off in the customs revenues shall continue this year, it is perfectly apparent that there will be, instead of a loss of $26,000,000, a loss of $150,000,000 in our customs revenues.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator is mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from North Carolina will not make that statement after consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. That statement is incorrect?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that statement is incorrect.

Mr. SIMMONS. If that falling off should continue, it would be a little less than four times $34,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be a little more than four times $8,000,000. The whole loss of last year was $26,000,000, while the loss up to the present time is $34,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. The estimates that I made had reference to the falling off during the months since the European war. If the falling off during the months since the war—that is, during the months of August, September, and October—shall continue, then there will be a loss of $150,000,000 in customs revenue.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina, and also to the Senate and to the country, that there will not be a loss in customs revenue of $150,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am stating this upon the calculations of the Actuary of the Treasury. I have not myself calculated it.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] to a statement which he made through inadvertence. In his statement the Senator from Rhode Island said that the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House had estimated that during the last fiscal year there was a falling off in revenue to the amount of $4,000,000. If the Senator from Rhode Island will read the report of the Ways and Means Committee of the other House, he will see that he has made a mistake. He has confused the average monthly additional receipts from the income and from the corporation taxes with the falling off in the customs revenues. The falling off in the customs revenues, as given by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, was $26,000,000 for the fiscal year 1914. That was a little over $2,000,000 a month; but he does not in his calculation—and I suppose the Senator from Rhode Island got that calculation—estimate for the next year our receipts from the income tax and from the corporation tax. I believe he reached the conclusion that the increase amounted, as resulting from the income tax and the change in the corporation tax, to a little over $4,000,000. I refer to the figures the Senator gave a little while ago. The actual falling off in the revenues last year as he gives it was only a little over $2,000,000 a month. Up to this time the actual falling off has been more than $10,000,000 a month.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LIPPITT. I thought the Senator from North Carolina was through.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was proposing to proceed with the amendments.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I will only take one single moment, if the Senator will allow me. In the course of my remarks a short time ago I made the statement that the estimated expenditures and the estimated income of the Government differed somewhere in the neighborhood of $50,000,000. I now have before me—which I did not at that moment have—the report which was submitted to the other House by the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, which is published on page 16423 of the RECORD, and which I should like to have included as a part of my remarks on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, permission to do so will be granted.

(The table referred to is printed on following page.)

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, it will be seen that that table shows that the estimated appropriations of the Government were $1,089,408,777.26, and that the total estimated revenue was $1,036,000,000, showing a difference of about $50,000,000, as I have stated.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I want to put in the RECORD, once for all, these facts: The total appropriations for the support of the Government made for the fiscal year 1913 were $1,019,412,710.91. For the fiscal year 1914 the total appropriations were $1,098,678,788.40, an increase for the fiscal year 1914 over the fiscal year 1913 of something over $79,000,000.

The appropriations for the fiscal year 1915, including the $20,000,000 for the river and harbor bill, were $1,109,408,777.26, showing that for the two fiscal years ending 1914 and 1915, respectively, there have been appropriated a total in excess of former years of about $170,000,000.

Chronological history of appropriation bills, second session of the Sixty-third Congress, estimates and appropriations for the fiscal year 1914–15, and appropriations for the fiscal year 1913–14.

[4] No river and harbor act having become a law, the amount of the estimates, the dates and amounts of the bill in its several stages of consideration up to this time, and the amount of the last law are shown (in parentheses) in order to preserve their history, but none of the amounts are included in the totals stated herein

[5] No river and harbor act has become a law at this session, but the sum of $6,988,500 is appropriated in the sundry civil act to carry out contracts heretofore authorized for river and harbor improvements.

[6] The sum of $10,045,795 was appropriated in the sundry civil act to carry out contracts authorized by law for river and harbor improvements for 1914.

[7] This amount includes $7,217,500 to carry out contracts authorized by law for river and harbor improvements, and $26,326,985 for construction and fortification of the Panama Canal for 1915, and is exclusive of $5,593,221 carried under "Miscellaneous."

[8] This amount includes $6,988,500 to carry out contracts authorized by law for river and harbor improvements, and $21,842,475 for construction and fortification of the Panama Canal for 1915.

[9] This amount includes $10,045,795 to carry out contracts authorized by law for river and harbor improvements, and $21,135,393 for construction and fortification of the Panama Canal for 1914.

[10] This amount is approximated.

[11] This is the amount submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury in the annual estimates for the fiscal year 1915, the exact amount appropriated not being ascertainable until two years after the close of the fiscal year. This amount includes estimated amount of $60,717,000 to meet sinking-fund obligations for 1915.

[12] In addition to this amount contracts are authorized to be entered into, subject to future appropriations by Congress, as follows: By the fortification act, $600,000; by the naval act, $26,650,000; by the sundry civil act, $810,000; in all, $28,060,000.

[13] In addition to this amount contracts are authorized to be entered into, subject to future appropriations by Congress, as follows: By the Army act, $150,000; by the District of Columbia act, $1,615,000; by the fortification act, $300,000; by the naval act, $21,296,524; by the river and harbor act, $6,795,800; by the public buildings act, $38,347,850 (exclusive of $8,161,000 for authorizations without contracts, etc.); in all, $68,505,174.

Coming to the matter of income collected from the tariff duties for the 10 months counting from the 1st of October, 1913, which was three days prior to the passage of the Underwood tariff law, up to the end of July, 1914, the total income from the tariff was $229,461,967. For the same 10 months in the preceding year the total income was $260,122,037, showing that during 10 months under the Underwood-Simmons law from the time of its passage up to the 1st of August last, before the outbreak of the war in Europe, the loss in revenue was $30,660,070, or an average of over $3,000,000 a month as compared with the income from the tariff during the same months under the Payne-Aldrich law.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was unable to hear the statement of the Senator from Minnesota, as Senators were talking to me; but I understood that he was comparing the customs receipts of the last year with those of the previous year, and that he also made a comparison of appropriations. I do not know what result he reached; but I want to suggest to the Senator that if he will investigate the tables a little further he will find that from 1906 to 1910, during which period his party was in power, the increase in the appropriations amounted in those four years to $268,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just one word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Democratic Party went before the country and bitterly criticized the Republicans for the natural increases, and called it "a profligate waste."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I wish to state that I think one important fact was omitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and I think the same fact has been omitted by a number of Senators on the other side of the aisle.

It is true that the appropriations for the current expenses of the Government for the fiscal year closing June 30, 1914, were $1,098,000,000; it is also true that the appropriations for the current expenses of the Government for the fiscal year closing June 30, 1915, were $1,115,000,000, an apparent increase of $17,000,000, or less than the ordinary average increase; but I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota, and I call the attention of other Senators to the fact that that apparent increase is due to and is explained by an increase of $27,000,000 in the appropriations for the Postal Service.

The Senator knows that the Postal Service pays its own way; it is no charge on the Treasury of the United States; it is no charge on the revenues arising either from customs duties or from internal revenue. Deducting that item, the appropriations for the year 1915 are less by $10,000,000, at least, than the appropriations for 1914, not to speak of the additional extraordinary expense arising out of the Mexican situation. I think that ought to be stated in order to complete the record.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I have never made any comparisons between appropriations for the year 1914 and those for the year 1915. They were all passed by a Democratic Congress. My comparisons were between the last appropriation bills for which the Republican Party was responsible and the appropriation bills enacted during the present session.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, just which appropriation bills does the Senator now claim credit for on behalf of the Republican Party?

Mr. SMOOT. The last ones when the party was in power—1913.

Mr. GORE. I will suggest, Mr. President, that the House of Representatives, under the Constitution of the United States, is charged with the origination of revenue measures and charged with the origination of appropriation bills, and those measures, the economy of which has been so loudly exploited by Senators on the other side, originated in a Democratic House, and their economy is due to the insistence of the Democratic House.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that the Senate was Republican and had the last say so on the appropriation bills.

Mr. GORE. I will suggest that the appropriation bills in the Sixty-second Congress were higher when they passed the Senate than they were when they came to the Senate from the Democratic House.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President; it was known from one end of this country to the other that items were left out of the appropriation bills by the House with the avowed purpose of showing how extravagant was the Republican Senate and to be used for political purposes. Items amounting to millions of dollars were left out by the House knowing they would have to be added in the Senate.

I want to say to the Senator also that ever since the Government began appropriation bills as sent to the Senate from the House are less than the appropriation bills after they have passed the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Of course that is true, but I was simply observing that the measures to which the Senator has referred originated in a Democratic House, and the first effort I have heard to exploit those measures for partisan purposes has been by the Senators on the other side appropriating exclusive credit to a Republican Senate, when the credit, at least, must be shared by the Democratic House.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to be perfectly fair in my statement. I could have gone back a year further, when the House was Republican and the Senate was also Republican, and could have shown that the appropriations were still less, but I did not want it to be said by the Senator from Oklahoma, or by any other Senator, that I was going back four years and not taking into consideration the natural increase that comes to appropriation bills because of the growth of the country. So I simply went back two years, when the Senate was Republican and was responsible for the totals carried by the appropriation bills.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if it is not a fact that, notwithstanding the Democratic denunciation of Republican extravagance, the last appropriation bills passed when the House and the Senate were both Republican carried less than any bill that has been passed since that time, even when the appropriation bills have originated in a Democratic House?

Mr. SMOOT. No doubt that is true.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, can the Senator from Washington tell the amount carried by the deficiency bills at the following session? That would be essential to a completion of that argument.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but I will say, in response to the observation made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], that the deficiency bills never have been so high as they were in the Congress preceding the present one, when there was a Democratic House and a Republican Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee on page 40.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, line 5, it is proposed to strike out the word "accident" and the comma after it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On the same page, line 16, after the word "any," I move to insert the word "liability" and a comma.

The SECRETARY. After the word "any," in line 16, page 40, and before the word "fidelity," it is proposed to insert the word "liability" and a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On the same page, at the end of line 19, I move to insert the matter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, line 19, after the word "thereof," it is proposed to insert a colon and the following words:

Provided, That whenever a policy is canceled or returned or a premium is returned or refunded, in whole or in part, the tax upon such unearned, returned, or refunded premium, or part thereof, shall be repaid pro rata to the person, association, or corporation paying the same. Statements verified by some officer of the company or companies availing themselves of this provision shall be made and filed with the collector of the proper district every 30 days, setting forth the items upon which such refund is to be made: Provided further, That policies of reinsurance shall be exempt from the tax herein imposed by this paragraph.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 41, line 11, after the word "ticket," I move to insert a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. After the word "passenger," in line 11, I move to insert "sold in the United States for passage."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that the words "for each passenger" have not been agreed to, and the Chair will put the question on that amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "ticket" and the comma, just agreed to, it is proposed to insert the words "for each passenger."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understand those words have been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; they have been agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Secretary to state the last amendment? I did not hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "passenger," it is proposed to insert the words "sold in the United States for passage."

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator having the bill in charge to read the paragraph as he intends to have it finally amended? Then I can follow it and see what changes are made.

Mr. SIMMONS. It would then read:

Passage ticket, sold in the United States for passage by any vessel from a port in the United States to a foreign port——

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator proposes to strike that out?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I want to strike out "from a port in the United States." That is the next amendment. After the word "vessel," in line 11, I move to strike out down to and including the word "States"; that is, strike out "from a port in the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Secretary state the last amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 41, lines 11 and 12, it is proposed to strike out the words "from a port in the United States," so that, if amended, the paragraph will read:

Passage ticket, sold in the United States for passage by any vessel to a foreign port.

Mr. WILLIAMS. "For each passenger."

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me it ought to be "to a foreign port or place." They may land somewhere where there is not a port, and to cover the whole thing it ought to read "or place."

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, that amendment will be made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I am not certain that I understood the Secretary. Was the language "for each passenger," in line 11, adopted?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to inquire if the Secretary has left out the words "for each passenger"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have been inserted, so the Secretary advises the Chair.

Mr. SIMMONS. All right.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee I move to strike out what is printed as section 3 of the bill, beginning on page 4, and to substitute the matter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 3, as proposed by the committee and printed in the bill on pages 4 and 5, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 3. That upon all still wines, domestic and imported, when sold or offered for sale or consumption, there shall be levied and collected taxes as follows: On each bottle containing one-fourth pint or less, one-fourth cent; on each bottle containing more than one-fourth pint and not more than one-half pint, one-half cent; on each bottle containing more than one-half pint and not more than 1 pint, 1 cent; and on each bottle containing more than 1 pint and not more than 1 quart, 2 cents; and on still wines in all other containers, not herein specially provided for, the tax shall be at the rate of 8 cents per gallon.

That upon all domestic and imported champagne wines, when sold or offered for sale or consumption, there shall be levied and collected taxes as follows: Upon each bottle containing one-half pint or less, 7 cents; on each bottle containing more than one-half pint and not more than 1 pint, 13 cents; on each bottle containing more than 1 pint and not more than 1 quart, 25 cents; and on all other containers at the rate of 25 cents per quart; and on all artificially carbonated wines there shall be levied and collected taxes as follows: On each bottle containing not more than one-half pint, 2½ cents; more than one-half pint and not more than 1 pint, 5 cents; more than 1 pint and not more than 1 quart, 10 cents; and on all other containers at the rate of 10 cents per quart; and on all liqueurs, cordials, or similar compounds, domestic and imported, by whatever name sold or offered for sale, there shall be levied and collected a tax on each bottle containing not more than one-half pint, 1½ cents; more than one-half pint and not more than 1 pint, 3 cents; more than 1 pint and not more than 1 quart, 6 cents; and on larger containers a tax at the rate of 24 cents per gallon.

All of the taxes imposed in the preceding paragraphs of this section shall be paid by stamps to be affixed to each bottle or container in which such still wines, champagne wines, carbonated wines, liqueurs, or cordials, or similar compounds are sold or offered for sale: Provided, That when such still wines, champagne wines, carborated wines, liqueurs, cordials, or similar compounds, taxable under the provisions of this section, are sold or delivered by the producer, importer, or dealer in wholesale quantities to other dealers, including rectifiers, manufacturing chemists, and druggists, the dealer receiving and selling, or offering the same for sale or consumption to any person other than a dealer, shall affix thereto the stamps hereinbefore prescribed: And provided further, That the stamp tax herein imposed shall not be collected on any still wine used by any rectifier, manufacturing chemist, or druggist in the manufacture of any medicinal preparation, proprietary articles, liqueur, cordial, or compound subject to any internal-revenue tax imposed by this act.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause to be prepared suitable and special stamps donating the tax herein imposed, to be affixed and canceled in such manner as he, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe; and in the absence of such stamps from any bottle or container containing wine, liqueur, cordial, or compound taxable under the provisions of this section, sold or offered for sale or consumption, shall be prima facie evidence that the tax thereon has not been paid, and all such wines, liqueurs, cordials, or compounds shall be forfeited to the United States.

There shall be levied and assessed against the maker or producer of all wines fortified under the provisions and conforming to the requirements of the sections of the tariff act of October 1, 1890, relating to the fortification of pure sweet wines, as amended, and as further amended by this act, a tax of 55 cents on each taxable gallon of grape brandy or wine spirits used by him in the fortification of such wines: Provided, however, That the maker or producer of such fortified wines shall, under regulations and suitable bonds, to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, have assessed against him monthly the said tax of 55 cents on each taxable gallon of grape brandy or wine spirits used by him during the preceding month, which assessment shall be paid within 90 days from the date of notice thereof: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as exempting any still wines, cordials, liqueurs, or similar compounds from the payment of any stamp tax provided for in this section.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to make all necessary regulations to make effective the provisions of this section.

That sections 42, 43, 45, 46, and 49 of the act of October 1, 1890, as amended by section 68 of an act approved August 28, 1894, and by an act approved June 7, 1906, are further amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 42. That any producer of pure sweet wines may use in the preparation of such sweet wines, under such regulations, and after the filings of such notices and bonds, together with the keeping of such records and the rendition of such reports as to materials and products as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, wine spirits produced by any duly authorized distiller, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in determining the liability of any distiller of wine spirits to assessment under section 3309 of the Revised Statutes, is authorized to allow such distiller credit in his computations for the wine spirits withdrawn to be used in fortifying sweet wines under this act: Provided, That such wine containing after fortification more than 24 per cent of alcohol, as defined by section 3249 of the Revised Statutes, shall be forfeited to the United States.

"SEC. 43. That the wine spirits mentioned in section 42 of this act is the product resulting from the distillation of fermented grape juice, or residues of grapes to which water may have been added prior to, during, or after fermentation for the sole purpose of facilitating the fermentation and economical distillation thereof, and shall be held to include the product from grapes commonly known as grape brandy, and shall include commercial grape brandy which may have been colored with burnt sugar or caramel; and the pure sweet wine which may be fortified with wine spirits under the provisions of this act is fermented with partially fermented grape juice only, with the usual cellar treatment, and shall contain no other substance whatever introduced before, at the time of, or after fermentation, except as herein expressly provided: Provided, That the addition of pure boiled or condensed grape must or pure crystallized cane or beet sugar, or pure dextrose sugar, or water, or any or all of them, to the pure grape juice before fermentation, or in the fermented product of such grape juice, or to both, prior to the fortification provided in this act, either for the purpose of perfecting sweet wines according to commercial standards or for mechanical purposes, shall not be excluded by the definition of pure sweet wine aforesaid: Provided, however, That the cane or beet sugar or pure dextrose sugar so used shall not be in excess of 11 per cent of the weight of the wine to be fortified under this act: And provided further, That the addition of water herein authorized shall be under such regulations and limitations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may from time to time prescribe: Provided, however, That records kept in accordance with such regulations as to the percentage of saccharine, acid, alcoholic, and added water content of the wine offered for fortification shall be open to inspection by any official of the Department of Agriculture thereto duly authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture; but in no case shall such wines to which water has been added be eligible for fortification under the provisions of this act, where the same, after fermentation and before fortification, have an alcoholic strength of less than 5 per cent of their volume.

"SEC. 45. That under such regulations and official supervision, and upon the execution of such entries and the giving of such bonds, bills of lading, and other security as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, any producer of pure sweet wines as defined by this act may withdraw wine spirits from any special bonded warehouse in original packages or from any registered distillery in any quantity not less than 80 gallons, and may use so much of the same as may be required by him under such regulations, and after the filing of such notices and bonds and the keeping of such records and the rendition of such reports as to materials and products and the disposition of the same as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe in fortifying the pure sweet wines made by him, and for no other purpose, in accordance with the foregoing limitations and provisions; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized whenever he shall deem it to be necessary for the prevention of violations of this law to prescribe that wine spirits withdrawn under this section shall not be used to fortify wines except at a certain distance prescribed by him from any distillery, rectifying house, winery, or other establishment used for producing or storing distilled spirits, or for making or storing wines other than wines which are so fortified, and that in the building in which such fortification of wines is practiced no wines or spirits other than those permitted by this regulation shall be stored in any room or part of the building in which fortification of wines is practiced. The use of wine spirits for the fortification of sweet wines under this act shall be under the immediate supervision of an officer of internal revenue, who shall make returns describing the kinds and quantities of wine so fortified, and shall affix such stamps and seals to the packages containing such wines as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall provide by regulations the time within which wines so fortified with the wine spirits so withdrawn may be subject to inspection, and for final accounting for the use of such wine spirits and for rewarehousing or for payment of the tax on any portion of such wine spirits which remain not used in fortifying pure sweet wines.

"SEC. 46. That wine spirits may be withdrawn from special bonded warehouses at the instance of any person desiring to use the same to fortify any wines, in accordance with commercial demands of foreign markets, when such wines are intended for exportation, without the payment of tax on the amount of wine spirits used in such fortification under such regulations and after making such entries and executing and filing with the collector of the district from which the removal is to be made such bonds and bills of lading, and giving such other additional security to prevent the use of such wine spirits free of tax otherwise than in the fortification of wine intended for exportation and for the due exportation of the wine so fortified, as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and all of the provisions of law governing the exportation of distilled spirits free of tax, so far as applicable, shall apply to the withdrawal and use of wine spirits and the exportation of the same in accordance with this section; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to prescribe that wine spirits intended for the fortification of wines under this section shall not be introduced into such wines except under the immediate supervision of an officer of internal revenue who shall make returns describing the kinds and quantities of wines so fortified, and shall affix such stamps and seals to the packages containing such wines as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Whenever transportation of such wine is to be effected by land carriage the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe such regulations as to sealing packages and vehicles containing the same, and as to the supervision of transportation from the point of departure, which point shall be determined as the place where such wine spirits may be introduced into such wines, to the point of destination, as may be necessary to insure the due exportation of such fortified wines: Provided, That where, in accordance with regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, wines fortified under the provisions of this act with brandy taxable at 55 cents per proof gallon are exported directly from the winery where fortified, there shall be allowed an abatement or refund of tax equivalent to 55 cents per gallon on each proof gallon of wine spirits contained in such wine at the time of exportation, which amount of wine spirits shall be ascertained by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That such wine spirits on which abatement or refund of tax is allowed shall not exceed the total amount of alcohol in such wine over and above 14 per cent thereof.

"SEC. 49. That wine spirits used in fortifying wines may be recovered from such wines only on the premises of a duly authorized grape-brandy distiller, and for the purpose of such recovery wine so fortified may be received as material on the premises of such a distiller on a special permit of the collector of internal revenue in whose district the distillery is located, and the distiller will be held to pay the tax on the product from such wines as will include both the alcoholic strength therein produced by the fermentation of the grape juice and that obtained from the added wine spirits: Provided, That when application for such special permit for redistillation shall be made by the producer of any wines fortified with brandy subject to the tax of 55 cents per proof gallon, before such wine shall have been moved from the premises of the winery where fortified and the redistillation is had under regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, an abatement or refund of the tax assessed against said producer shall be allowed equivalent to 55 cents per proof gallon of brandy contained in said spirits at the time of redistillation, which amount of brandy shall be ascertained by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and wine spirits so recovered may be used in the manner provided by law for the fortification of other wine: Provided, That such wine spirits on which abatement or refund of tax is allowed shall not exceed the total amount of alcohol in such wine over and above 14 per cent thereof."

That section 3 and section 6 of the act of June 7, 1906, amending the laws relating to the fortification of pure sweet wines, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized to assign at each winery where wines are to be fortified such number of gaugers or storekeeper gaugers, in the capacity of gaugers, for special duties as may be necessary for the proper supervision of the making and fortifying of such wines, and the compensation of such officers shall not exceed $5 per diem while so assigned, together with the actual and necessary traveling expenses, and also a reasonable allowance for their board bills, to be fixed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but not to exceed $2 per diem for said board bills. That bonds hereafter given under the provisions of the aforesaid act of October 1, 1890, as amended, shall be conditioned for the payment of the tax on all brandy removed thereunder and not used and accounted for within the time and in the manner required by law and regulations, and for the payment of all taxes imposed on the brandy so withdrawn and used for fortifications; and the said bonds shall contain such other conditions as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

"SEC. 6. That any person who by any process recovers from wines fortified under the provisions of the aforesaid act approved October 1, 1890, or amendments thereto, any brandy or wine spirits used in the manufacture or fortification of said wine, otherwise than is provided for in said act and its amendments, or who shall rectify, mix, or compound with distilled spirits or other materials, except as provided in this act, such grape brandy or wine spirits unlawfully recovered therefrom, shall, on conviction, be punished for each such offense by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000. But the provisions of this section and the provisions of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended, relating to rectification, or other internal-revenue laws of the United States, shall not be held to apply to or prohibit the mixing or blending of pure sweet wines fortified under the provisions of this act with each other or with other wines: Provided, That the pure sweet wines fortified under the provisions of this act may be used in the manufacture of cordials, liqueurs, and similar compounds on which an internal-revenue tax of 24 cents a gallon is imposed, and otherwise the provision of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall remain in full force and effect."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator from Missouri allow the amendment to go over until to-morrow in order that it may be printed, so that we can read it and see what it is? It is a very long, and it is impossible to form any idea of it from merely hearing it read.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am not in control of the bill. I was a member of the subcommittee to which was referred this section relating to wines, and because of that I presume the chairman of the committee asked me to present the amendment; but I am not in control of the bill, and I do not know whether it is agreeable to the chairman of the committee to have the amendment go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like very much to have it acted on to-night.

Mr. STONE. If my friend from Washington will permit me, I will say this much to him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that we might as well act on the amendment this afternoon.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that there has been for many years, as the Senator is doubtless aware, a rather exasperating and hurtful controversy between what may be called the western makers of grape wine, still wines, and what may be called the eastern makers of such wines; that is, those manufacturers who do business this side of the Rocky Mountains. An effort has been made here to amend the wine law, so called, so as to adjust these hurtful differences and bring about a condition of greater equality between all those engaged in this somewhat important industry. To do that it became necessary to amend several sections of the old law relating to the manufacture of still wines.

When we were considering that question we had before us expert officials of the Internal-Revenue Bureau of the Treasury Department and also experts employed in the Chemical and Pure Food Bureau of the Agricultural Department. We conferred with these gentlemen in the preparation of the amendment to the old law and had their assistance and advice. The amendment is not objected to now. It does not interfere with the administration of the law in any way. It is just as easy of administration under the amendment as under the present law. All the people who are engaged in this industry have been represented here in these consultations, and all of them, without exception—that is, the manufacturers of still wines, whether dry or sweet wines—are satisfied with the amendment. They have addressed a letter to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], as chairman of the Finance Committee, which is signed by the authorized representatives of the American Wine Growers' Association, the National Wine Growers' Association, the California Grape Protective Association, and the Mississippi Valley Wine Growers and Grape Growers' Association. These associations all together embrace all the manufacturers of these wines.

It is very desirable that this old controversy should be terminated and the industry put upon a sounder and a more equitable basis. It is believed that this amendment will accomplish that. The amendment is satisfactory to the trade and satisfactory to those who are to administer the law; and since no injury can be done or would be suffered by the Government, since it would heal an old sore, I see no reason why the amendment should not be agreed to.

I wish in this connection to have the letter I have just referred to, addressed to the chairman of the Finance Committee, printed as a part of these explanatory remarks. I will not take the time to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, October 14, 1914.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
Chairman Finance Committee, United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: For many years there has been a universal desire among the grape growers and wine makers of America to standardize the quality of our domestic wines along lines that will permit all sections to make legitimate wines upon terms of equality. We are pleased to state that after several weeks of earnest effort a plan has been worked out covering the making of sweet wines which is satisfactory to every wine-making State in the Union. This plan is found in the proposed bill which was sent to your subcommittee on the 12th instant with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Not only will this measure raise more than the amount of revenue anticipated by your committee from wine sources, but it will permanently settle all sectional differences and contribute materially to the upbuilding of the American wine industry upon a sound basis.

In view of the fact that the American champagne makers are very earnestly representing that their industry will be seriously affected by a tax of 25 cents per quart on champagne wines, we beg to suggest that perhaps this particular rate may be revised without materially affecting the amount of revenue desired or affecting the remainder of the proposed bill. Aside from this item, the undersigned, representing all of the grape-growing States, earnestly ask that the proposed bill be enacted into law, and that, if consistent, an opportunity be afforded them to further present their views to the committee.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have no objection to the request just made and address myself to the matter of the amendment.

I am very much obliged to the Senator from Missouri for his very clear general statement as to the purpose and effect of the amendment. I do not know that in behalf of any interest on the Pacific coast anything further need be said on the subject. It was only for the purpose of giving an opportunity for the reading of the amendment, at least, that I made the request of the Senator from Missouri to have it printed so that we would have it on our desks to-morrow and allow action on it to go over until that time.

I do not know what occurred in the Committee on Finance in the consideration of the amendment. Of course, I have the utmost confidence in the Committee on Finance, as the Senate has, but there is no one on that committee from the Pacific coast, which is a great grape-producing country.

Mr. STONE. May I ask the Senator, for information, whether——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I ask the Senator whether any considerable amount of still wine is made in Washington?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not any considerable amount in Washington, but a very considerable amount in California.

Mr. STONE. Oh, 90 per cent of it is made in California.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is no one from California or from that part of the country on this committee.

Mr. STONE. That is true; but I see one of the Senators from California present. I have not personally conferred with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], but in his presence I will state that representatives of the wine makers of California, among them the vice president of the association there, were present at the time these matters were being considered. The vice president of that association has been in conference with members of the committee, and he, speaking for the wine makers, not only agrees to these amendments to settle these differences; but he is very anxious that they should be agreed to. He signed the letter that I sent to the desk for printing in the RECORD.

The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], who is present, I am sure has been consulted by the people interested.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I will say that representative wine growers of California, representing very large areas of land, state that this amendment is satisfactory to them.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it is a very long amendment. It is equivalent in length to an entire act covering an entire subject. I ask that it go over. I do not like to insist on it unduly, but I shall have to make that request.

Mr. STONE. Personally I should be very glad to accommodate the Senator from Washington about this or anything else. I should, however, very much dislike to see the passage of the bill delayed. I am not in control of it, but I am sure that the Senator from Washington could have no objection to this amendment, since the Treasury officials who are to administer the law are agreeable to it, and since the pure-food bureau of the Government is to have constant access to all the data that the law requires to be kept, and they are to know what is done. It is really an improvement in that respect on the existing law. It is satisfactory to the wine makers of California, as stated on the floor by the Senator from that State who has been in consultation with some of us who have engaged in this work, though not personally with me. Ninety per cent of this still wine is made in California, and the accredited representatives of those people are favorable to the amendment. I can not, therefore, understand why anybody else should object to it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There might not be any reason to object, and there might not be any objection. The basis on which I am making my request is not that there is any objection to the amendment. What I am making my request for is in order that we may have an opportunity to read the amendment before we are called upon to vote on it.

I have no doubt that what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] says is true, but the Senate and all the interests concerned at least ought to have an opportunity of knowing what we are acting upon. There are other amendments, I assume, which the committee has that could be presented to the Senate to occupy the time of the Senate for the remainder of this day. I do not think my request that the amendment go over is an unreasonable one.

Mr. STONE. I will say that, if the Senator from Washington, after the matter is printed in the RECORD in the morning, looks the amendment over and feels that any part of it ought to be reconsidered, I would offer no objection to doing that, and that he might be heard in opposition, if he wishes to do so, by way of amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is exceedingly liberal of the Senator to allow another Senator an opportunity to be heard upon the matter before it is acted upon; but I had rather have the opportunity of doing that without having it conceded to me.

Mr. STONE. For the information of the Senator from Washington and of the Senate, I shall ask to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a memorandum of the wine sections, giving the effect of these amendments on the various sections amended, and let it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The memorandum referred to is as follows:

MEMORANDUM—WINE SECTION WAR-REVENUE BILL.

Estimated revenue:

Still wines, 45,000,000 gallons, at 6 cents	$2,700,000
Champagnes, 300,000 cases, at $3	900,000
Carbonated wines, 15,000 cases, at $1.20	18,000
Cordials, 10,000,000 gallons, at 24 cents	2,400,000
Grape brandy, 3,000,000 gallons, at 55 per cent	1,650,000
	7,668,000

Proposed changes in sweet-wine law of October 1, 1890, and act of June 7, 1906.

1. By imposing a tax of 55 cents per gallon on wine spirits used in fortifying sweet wines, instead of 3 cents per gallon now imposed, same to be paid within three months after notice of assessment.
2. Amending section 42 by omitting—
(a) Words "who is also a distiller."
(b) Reference to preservation of saccharine matter.
(c) Fourteen per cent limitation as to brandy to be used, but retaining the 24 per cent limitation.
(d) Limitation of fortifying period.
3. Amending section 43—
(a) By striking out requirement as to 4 per cent sugar.
(b) By allowing use of commercial brandy.
(c) By increasing added sugar from 10 per cent now limited in act to 11 per cent.
(d) By substituting "dextrose" for "anhydrous" sugar, for greater certainty of name.
(e) By allowing water to be used for ameliorating or mechanical purposes under regulations and limitations to be presented by Internal-Revenue Department.
(f) All records of ingredients contained in or added to wines to be open to inspection of Department of Agriculture.
4. Amending section 45—
(a) By eliminating requirement that fortification shall be at vineyard of the wine maker.
5. Amending section 46—
(a) By permitting wines for export to be fortified at winery, instead of alongside of exporting vessel, as now required.
(b) By providing for an allowance of drawback on exported wines in which tax-paid brandy has been used.
6. Amending section 49—
(a) By providing for an allowance on account of tax paid on brandy used in fortifying wines and subsequently recovered by wine maker before the fortified wines leave his premises.
7. Amending section 3, act of June 7, 1906—
(a) By providing for bonds securing payment of tax on brandy used in fortifying wines.
8. Amending section 6, act of June 7, 1906—
(a) By extending the provisions of that section exempting from special tax as rectifiers persons who use fortified wine "in the manufacture of cordials, liquors, or similar compounds, upon which a tax is paid," and allowing blending of wines.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Washington will let us act on the matter to-night. If on to-morrow he feels that he desires to be heard on it, he can then be heard.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is impossible for me to state, Mr. President, whether——

Mr. STONE. Of course; but the Senator can read the amendment in the morning, if he wishes, before we meet. That is what he would have to do anyway, whether the amendment went over or not. I merely want to get ahead with the bill. The Senator from Washington loses no right under my proposition, and I am sure he will not want to interpose in the way of the obstruction of this legislation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, the discussion of the suggestion which I have made is likely to occupy considerable more time than would be occupied in action upon the amendment if we had an opportunity to see it.

Mr. STONE. Why would it take any more time?

Mr. POINDEXTER. For the reason that I consider the request which I made of the Senator from Missouri an extremely reasonable one.

Mr. STONE. Except that it delays the passage of the bill; that is the only thing.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The passage of bills ought to be delayed long enough for Senators to see what they are voting upon. There is no Senator in the Senate who has not previously considered this matter who can state what it contains or what its effect will be from merely hearing it read by the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have made about all the appeal I can, and I have offered, I think, a very fair solution of this question to the Senator from Washington. If he is not disposed to accept the suggestion, I am at my row's end. I have no authority to postpone the consideration of the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. STONE. I beg the Chair's pardon. The Senator did not ask unanimous consent. He asked the Senator from Missouri to pass the amendment over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Washington had asked the Senate to have the amendment go over, and was appealing to the Senator from Missouri to acquiesce.

Mr. STONE. There is no need of our wasting time on that. The Senator from Washington made his appeal to me, as I understood him, and I said that I could not accede to it without the consent of the chairman of the committee; and that, without that consent, I should have to object to the amendment going over.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which has been offered and is now pending be printed for the use of the Senate, and that its consideration be postponed until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the amendment be printed and that its consideration be postponed until to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I dislike very much to object, but I think we ought to go on with this bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think so myself; I agree with the Senator from North Carolina. That is why I think he ought to concede the request which I have made. The amendment going over will not delay the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, Mr. President, I shall not object.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator from North Carolina does not object, I shall not do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, what was the request? I did not hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has given unanimous consent to the amendment going over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not object to the amendment going over.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask unanimous consent, probably out of order, to offer an amendment, so that it may be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 11 I move to strike out all after the second line on that page and all of the next page down to line 3 and insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator's amendment include striking out line 3, on page 12?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, after line 2, it is proposed to strike out:

Manufacturers of cigarettes whose annual sales exceed 100,000,000 cigarettes shall each pay $2,496.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are very few Senators present at this time, and that is a most radical change in the bill as reported to the Senate. I know nothing about the effect of the amendment, and I ask the Senator if he will not allow it to be printed and go over until to-morrow morning?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will suggest to the Senator that there is nothing new in the principle involved in the amendment the committee has offered.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be true, but when a tax is raised from $96 to $2,496, it seems to me that it ought at least to receive some consideration by Senators whose States are interested in the production of tobacco and in the manufacture of cigars and cigarettes.

Mr. SIMMONS. This amendment does not affect the production of tobacco, but only its manufacture.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not mean the tobacco itself, but I meant in the manufacture of cigars and cigarettes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he has made any computation as to the amount which it is expected to obtain by this assessment?

Mr. SIMMONS. The amount of revenue?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; the amount of revenue on this new basis.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not give a definite answer, but I think up to the classification of $1,200 it was estimated that there would be about $200,000 increase in revenue.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The amendment proposes a very radical change.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am advised that it will increase the revenue with the additional classifications which have been up to $2,496, about $467,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would that be the total revenue derived from this particular schedule?

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What would be the total revenue under this particular schedule, according to the amendment just proposed by the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SIMMONS. About $4,900,000 was the amount estimated before the classification proposed by the amendment. The new classification would add $467,000, so that the total, as I run the figures out, would be about $5,300,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the total?

Mr. SIMMONS. That would include the tax on retail dealers, on the dealers in leaf tobacco, and on the manufacturers.

Mr. SMOOT. The report from the Secretary of the Treasury shows that the estimated revenue, including the tax on dealers in tobacco, would be $4,800,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no change as to the tax on dealers?

Mr. SIMMONS. No change in that respect at all.

Mr. SMOOT. That report also shows that from the tax on manufacturers of tobacco the estimated revenue was only $47,000. With this amendment what would it amount to?

Mr. SIMMONS. To $467,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Or an increase of about $420,000?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. What would it be including the manufacturers of cigars?

Mr. SIMMONS. The figures I stated included the manufacturers of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes.

Mr. SMOOT. It can not be that; it must be $467,000 increase.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; if the Senator will permit me, I think I can explain the matter in a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. In just a moment. I will say to the Senator that the estimated revenue from manufacturers of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes as reported to the Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury is $357,000. If the Senator from North Carolina is correct, the estimates now on the amendment just proposed is $467,000, or an increase of only $110,000.

Mr SIMMONS. No; that is based upon a maximum of $1,200. That maximum, I think, since that estimate, has been raised to $2,496. I have no estimate as to that under the last classification.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask the Senator once more, so that I may get a full understanding of it, what is the estimated revenue from the manufacturers of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes under the amendment just offered by the Senator?

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought I stated that to the Senator. Perhaps I made a mistake. The estimated income is $467,000, without the addition of the last classification.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh! Then, of course, it is an increase of even more than $467,000. That is what I thought when I made the latter statement—that it was an increase, and not the amount of tax.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What I wanted to suggest to the Senator was that this last classification does not add a very large amount of revenue, because it probably will apply only to 8 or 10 dealers in the country. What I furthermore wanted to impress upon the Senator was that these enlarged taxes upon the large dealers are still far below the pro rata tax which the small dealers are paying. The small dealer who pays $96 for the privilege of selling over 400,000 pounds of tobacco a year will be paying about five times as much tax as the large dealer who pays $2,496. In other words, large as this highest tax is, it is still about only one-fifth the pro rata tax paid by the small dealer; and it is in an effort to equalize these taxes upon the cost of doing business that the committee has consented to make this amendment.

My own judgment is that the change should have gone much further, and that the tax should have been much larger, so that the large dealer should pay as much in proportion as the small one. As the Senator says, however, it is a change from the past, and for that reason the committee has been overconservative.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I myself believe, figuring the sales of the small manufacturer and those of the large manufacturer, pro rata, the $96 would be perhaps just as much in comparison for the small dealer as the $2,496 for the larger dealer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; it is five times as much. I have computed it, and the small dealer will still pay five times as much in proportion to his business as the large dealer; so that this is not a radical or unreasonable increase on the large dealer. Instead of being $2,496 it ought to be much more than twice that amount in order to compel the large dealer to pay in proportion to the small dealer. It is a reform in the direction of justice. It is a reform in the direction of fair play, toward equalizing the burden of this tax.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. As I caught the amendment, it is a reduction on the small dealer and small manufacturer from the rate proposed in the original bill?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is. It starts with a reduction; yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I judged so, just from hearing the amendment read; but I was not particularly interested at this time in the question whether it was too small or too great. I simply asked that it go over and be printed, because it was such a radical change; and as a number of Senators from States that would be particularly interested in this matter are absent I thought it would be nothing more than fair to have it go over until to-morrow morning and allow the amendment to be printed, and then they can see for themselves how it would affect their own States.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator insists, let it go over, and we will take it up to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina, so that the RECORD may be straight, that the committee amendment on page 11, lines 11, 12, and 13, was agreed to, and I believe——

Mr. SIMMONS. That will have to be reconsidered.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe that would have to be reconsidered before the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will make that motion in the morning. The Senator is right about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator does not make that motion now?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I will make it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Beginning on page 26, sections 19, 20, 21, and 22, all being amendments offered by the committee, were passed over on yesterday at the request, I think, of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. At the time I made the request for the passing over of those sections I thought they referred to proprietary medicines, and I had not the time to read them. It was for that purpose only that I asked to have them go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for action upon them now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendments constituting sections 19, 20, 21, and 22.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 3, section 2 was passed over for the purpose of rewriting the so-called wine amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. That is pending.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the adoption of the committee amendment striking out those lines on page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to strike out lines 6 to 24, both inclusive, on page 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 7, paragraph "Fourth" was passed over at the suggestion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I should very much prefer to take up the amendments I have to offer for consideration after all of the amendments of the committee have been disposed of. My object in asking that that paragraph be passed over was to offer an amendment; but really there was no necessity for its going over, because there is no amendment to the House provision. So the Senator need not consider that item at this time; but I will offer an amendment after the committee amendments are all disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; that is agreed to, as I understand, subject to amendment by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina the advisability of having the bill reprinted with the amendments that have been adopted, so that we can see to-morrow exactly what amendments have been agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that, if the Senator will let me finish these other matters.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 9, paragraph "Tenth," that amendment was passed over, also. That is an amendment passed over at the suggestion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I wanted to consider that amendment of the committee in connection with the item of commercial brokers, because I think they ought to be considered together. Does the Senator desire to consider them now?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator has not his amendment prepared, and wishes time to prepare it——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I would very much prefer to have it go over, and consider the two together, because I think that is the only proper way to do.

Mr. SIMMONS. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 25, there is a committee amendment, beginning after the figures "$10,000," in line 6, that has not been acted upon. I offer that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 6, after the numerals "$10,000," it is proposed to insert "mutual ditch or irrigating companies."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Are those all the amendments the Senator desires to offer to section 16?

Mr. SIMMONS. Those are all the amendments we have to offer to that section.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I shall offer an amendment to that section after the Senator has concluded his amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. All right. On page 32, the paragraph beginning at line 19 was passed over. It was passed over for the purpose of an amendment, I think. That amendment has been offered and acted upon.

Mr. SMOOT. That was passed over, so as to offer an amendment to the paragraph in relation to the tax upon grain.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have offered an amendment, which the Senate has adopted, which I think is satisfactory all around.

The Senator from Minnesota has examined it, and the Senator from North Dakota has examined it, and I think they are satisfied.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from North Dakota are satisfied with the amendment that has already been offered, I shall say no more about it, because that was the amendment that I intended to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands no amendment has been offered.

Mr. SIMMONS. It has been offered and adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair means, to the section which the Senator from Utah is now discussing.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; not to the one that is now being discussed.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; there was a committee amendment offered to the section, beginning on page 32, line 19, after the word "court"; and now I understand the Senator from North Carolina to say that that amendment was perfectly satisfactory to the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think I am talking about the same amendment that the Senator from Utah is talking about.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; that is the amendment. It was put in at the suggestion of the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will not ask that it be read. I am satisfied if it is satisfactory to those Senators.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to see that I am talking about the same one. Yes; that is the same amendment. Now, on page 35——

Mr. SMOOT. That amendment was passed over at the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. He is not in the Chamber just at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will let it go over, in his absence. On page 37——

Mr. SMOOT. That amendment was passed over at the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well. On page 39, lines 11 to 19——

Mr. SMOOT. I believe I asked that the insurance item, on page 39, might be passed over, but the committee offered the amendment that I intended to offer to that paragraph.

Mr. SIMMONS. There are two amendments to that paragraph.

Mr. SMOOT. I say, the committee offered the one that I intended to offer. That was all I intended to do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, I ask for the adoption of those two amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 39, after line 10, it is proposed to insert the proviso, running down to the word "That," in line 19, as follows:

That whenever a policy is canceled or returned or a premium is returned or refunded, in whole or in part, the tax upon such unearned returned or refunded premium or part thereof shall be repaid pro rata to the person, association, or corporation paying the same. Statements verified by some officer of the company or companies availing themselves of this provision shall be made and filed with the collector of the proper district every 30 days, setting forth the items upon which such refund is to be made: Provided further.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, line 23, after the word "Provided," it is proposed to insert a colon and the words:

And provided further, That policies of reinsurance shall be exempt from the tax herein imposed by this paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 41——

Mr. SMOOT. The paragraph on page 41 in relation to passenger tickets has been amended by the committee in part as I intended to offer the amendment, but as to the balance of the paragraph I will offer amendments as soon as the committee amendments are disposed of, for they apply only to the House provision.

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee offered amendments to that paragraph to-day, which have been adopted; but there is one amendment which has been heretofore offered by the committee, beginning after "$5," on line 14, which has not yet been adopted, and I move the adoption of that amendment now.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right, Mr. President.

The SECRETARY. On page 41, line 14, after "$5," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That such passage tickets costing $10 or less shall be exempt from taxation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES. On behalf of the committee I desire to offer an amendment. On page 34, line 7, after the word "transportation," I move to insert "when a charge exceeding 5 cents is made."

Mr. SIMMONS. On behalf of the Committee on Finance I accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent, with the permission of the Senator from North Carolina, that the revenue bill be reprinted, showing all the amendments that have been adopted.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator would include in that the printing of the bill with the amendments offered as to tobacco and wine which have not been acted upon by the Senate?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think probably, after reflection, it would be better not to print the tobacco and the wine amendments in the bill, but to print them as separate amendments proposed by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, that course will be taken.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

DRESS AND WAIST INDUSTRY.

Mr. FLETCHER. On the 14th instant the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] presented a report prepared by N. I. Stone, chief statistician of the wage-scale board of the Dress and Waist Industry of New York City, and it was referred to the Committee on Printing for action. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report a resolution, and I ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 473) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by Mr. SMOOT on October 14, 1914, entitled "Wages, Regularity of Employment, and Standardization of Piece Rates in the Dress and Waist Industry of New York City," by N. I. Stone, chief statistician of the wage-scale board of the dress and waist industry, be printed as a Senate document.

MEMORIAL TO THE LATE SENATOR JOHN T. MORGAN.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. From the Committee on the Library I report back favorably, with amendments, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 196) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant permission to the Southern Commercial Congress to place a tablet at Gamboa, Canal Zone, as a memorial to the late Senator

John T. Morgan, and I call the attention of the Senator from Florida to the report.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution. It will take but a moment to dispose of it.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments of the Committee on the Library were, in line 3, after the words "placing of," to strike out the words "the said" and insert the letter "a", and in line 4, after the word "tablet," to insert "containing an appropriate bust of the late Senator John T. Morgan with an appropriate inscription," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Whereas the Southern Commercial Congress, on November 7, 1913, dedicated the bluff at Gamboa, in the Canal Zone, near the north entrance to Culebra Cut, as the site for placing a memorial tablet to the memory of the late Senator John T. Morgan, of Alabama; and

Whereas preparations have been made for placing the tablet containing a medallion bust of the late Senator Morgan and a legend reciting his leadership in keeping alive in the Congress of the United States the question of an interoceanic canal: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That permission is hereby granted for the placing of a tablet containing an appropriate bust of the late Senator John T. Morgan, with an appropriate inscription, at Gamboa, in the Canal Zone, at such time and under such regulations as the Secretary of War may direct.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the preamble be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the preamble will be stricken out.

THE FOREIGN SERVICE.

Mr. STONE. The bill (S. 5614) for the improvement of the foreign service is on the calendar. I should like very much to have it acted upon. I will say to the Senate that there are rather urgent reasons why the measure should be disposed of favorably.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the bill?

Mr. STONE. It is a bill classifying the secretaries of embassies and legations and those in the Consular Service and providing for transfers by the department.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments.

The amendments were to strike out sections 6 and 7 of the bill and to change the numbering of section 8 to section 6, the numbering of section 9 to section 7, and the numbering of section 10 to section 8, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter all appointments of secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and of consuls general and consuls shall be by commission to the offices of secretary of embassy or legation, consul general, or consul, and not by commission to any particular post, and that such officers shall be assigned to posts and transferred from one post to another by order of the President as the interests of the service may require: Provided, That no officer may be assigned for duty in the Department of State for a period of more than three years, unless the public interest demand further service, when such assignment may be extended for a period of not to exceed one year, and no longer.

SEC. 4. That a secretary, consul general, or consul of whatever class detailed for special duty outside of the city of Washington shall be paid his actual and necessary expenses for subsistence during such special detail: Provided, That such special duty shall not continue for more than 60 days unless in the case of international gatherings, congresses, or conferences, when such subsistence expenses shall run only during the life of the international gathering, congress, or conference, as the case may be.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of State is directed to report from time to time to the President, along with his recommendations for promotion or for transfer between the department and the foreign service, the names of those secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and the names of those consular officers or departmental officers or employees who by reason of efficient service, an accurate record of which shall be kept in the Department of State, have demonstrated special efficiency, and also the names of persons found upon examination to have fitness for appointment to the lower grades of the service.

SEC. 6. That section 1674 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1674. That the official designations employed throughout this title shall be deemed to have the following meanings, respectively:

"First. 'Consul general' and 'consul' shall be deemed to denote full, principal, and permanent consular officers as distinguished from subordinates and substitutes.

"Second. 'Consular agent' shall be deemed to denote consular officers subordinate to such principals exercising the powers vested in them and performing the duties prescribed for them by regulation of the President at posts or places different from those at which such principals are located, respectively.

"Third. 'Vice consuls' shall be deemed to denote consular officers subordinate to such principals exercising and performing the duties within the limits of their consulates at the same or at different points and places from those at which the principals are located, except that when vice consuls take charge of consulates general or consulates when the principal officers shall be temporarily absent or relieved from duty they shall be deemed to denote consular officers who shall be substituted, temporarily, to fill the places of said consuls general or consuls.

"Fourth. 'Consular officer' shall be deemed to include consuls general, consuls, vice consuls, interpreters in consular offices, student interpreters, and consular agents, and none others.

"Fifth. 'Diplomatic officer' shall be deemed to include ambassadors, envoys extraordinary, ministers plenipotentiary, ministers resident, commissioners, chargés d'affaires, agents, secretaries of embassy and legation, and secretaries in the Diplomatic Service, and none others."

The offices of vice consul general, deputy consul general, and deputy consul are abolished.

SEC. 7. That no ambassador, minister, minister resident, diplomatic agent, or secretary in the Diplomatic Service of any grade or class shall, while he holds his office, be interested in or transact any business as a merchant, factor, broker, or other trader, or as an agent for any such person to, from, or within the country or countries to which he or the chief of his mission, as the case may be, is accredited, either in his own name or in the name or through the agency of any other person, nor shall he, in such country or countries, practice as a lawyer for compensation or be interested in the fees or compensation of any lawyer so practicing.

SEC. 8. That this act shall take effect on the 30th day of September, 1914, when all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are repealed.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I would like to offer an amendment. At the end of section 1, line 2, page 2, I move to strike out the period after the word "longer" and insert a colon and then these words:

Provided further, That no secretary, consul general, or consul shall be promoted to a higher class except upon the nomination of the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. STONE. On the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] I will change it so as to read "shall not be promoted to a higher class or demoted to a lower class."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated as modified.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, after the word "longer" and before the period, insert a colon and the following:

: Provided further, That no secretary, consul general, or consul shall be promoted to a higher or demoted to a lower class except upon the nomination of the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Utah does not insist upon his amendment, so the part relating to demotion may go out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be modified by the omission of the words "or demoted to a lower."

Mr. STONE. Then it simply relates to promotions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM C. ADAMS.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to report favorably from the Committee on Indian Affairs the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 362) to correct an error in the enrollment of certain Indians enumerated in Senate Document No. 478, Sixty-third Congress, second session, enacted into law in the Indian appropriation act approved August 1, 1914.

It is a very short resolution. It simply purposes to change a name in the last Indian appropriation act. A large number of Indians were placed upon the roll as entitled to enrollment, and among them some Mississippi Choctaws, 21 in number, but the name of one of them was erroneously placed on the roll as Mitchell C. Adams, when it should have been William C. Adams. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to substitute the name of William C. Adams in place of Mitchell C. Adams, jr., in the list of Mississippi Choctaw Indians enumerated in Senate document No. 478, Sixty-third Congress, second session, which Indians so enumerated in said document were authorized to be enrolled on the respective rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes by section 17, paragraph 9, of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses for the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915," approved August 1, 1914.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan:

A bill (S. 6640) granting an increase of pension to Charles Pettys; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 6641) to transfer Capt. John Calvin Leonard from the retired to the active list of the United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

T. S. WILLIAMS.

Mr. BRYAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1055) for the relief of T. S. Williams having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$261"; and the House agree to the same.

N. P. BRYAN,
BLAIR LEE,
G. W. NORRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
EDWARD W. POU,
H. D. STEPHENS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

FREDERICK J. ERNST.

Mr. BRYAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4405) for the relief of Frederick J. Ernst, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

N. P. BRYAN,
FRANK S. WHITE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
EDWARD W. POU,
H. D. STEPHENS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 18459. An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow forenoon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m., Thursday, October 15, 1914) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, October 16, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, October 15, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Father soul, in whose all-embracing love we live and move and have our being, increase our faith and confidence in Thee, and teach us how to think great thoughts, to live noble lives, to grow old gracefully, to die peacefully, looking forward to the larger life which Thou hast prepared for Thy children, that we may honor ourselves and hallow Thy name. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Journal be approved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves the approval of the Journal.

The Journal was approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered by my distinguished colleague, the Speaker of the House, at the opening of the campaign in New Jersey last Saturday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a speech that I made at Atlantic City last night——

Mr. BUTLER. Last night?

The SPEAKER. Saturday night.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall not object to that one. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ALASKA COAL LANDS.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, the previous order of the House as to Calendar Wednesday to the contrary notwithstanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the Alaskan coal bill, notwithstanding that this is constructively Calendar Wednesday. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Printing, which has the right of way on Calendar Wednesday—that is to-day—has agreed to permit the consideration of this bill without demanding the regular order, because it believes that it is really emergent legislation, and therefore I shall not object to this request, with the understanding that immediately after the consideration of this bill the regular order will be requested.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, how much time for debate can we agree upon?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think there is any disposition on this side to hurry the matter or attempt to shut anyone off. I do not propose to use much time myself.

Mr. MANN. I will be perfectly frank with the House. There are two or three gentlemen who wish to be heard for a short time, I think, not on this bill. I wondered if we could agree on some time for length of debate on the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think there should be some understanding as to the exact amount of time to be used. If it comes out of the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], he is more concerned than anybody else.

Mr. BARNHART. If there is a disposition to indulge in general debate, I wish to say that the consideration of the printing bill is now nearing its close, and the committee would certainly like to finish it after these many weeks of consideration. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not desire to inject general debate into this bill. I trust there will be no general debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that when this bill is out of the way—and the printing bill can not go over until to-morrow—so far as I am concerned, if the gentleman desires to secure reasonable opportunity for general debate to-morrow morning, I shall have no objection.

Mr. MANN. Well, I will ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and myself shall each have control of an hour to-morrow for general debate after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object for a moment, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I understand there will be a resolution reported from the Committee on Rules to-morrow to take up this matter concerning the Board of Governors of the Soldiers' Home. I do not see the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] just now, but I understand that that measure will probably require half an hour for debate; so that I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he would be willing to have that matter considered first, and then have the general debate he desires afterwards?

Mr. MANN. I would not have any objection to that, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman made his request as applying immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but I could not put it otherwise, because there is no certainty that the rule will be reported. It will be subject to the report of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. What is the request?

Mr. MANN. That the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and myself each have control of one hour's time to-morrow immediately after the approval of the Journal, subject to the right of the Committee on Rules to bring in the rule referred to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table and the disposition of the rule, if reported, he and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] shall each have an hour on the Alaskan coal bill.

Mr. MANN. No; on anything—general debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; general debate.

Mr. MANN. Each to control an hour's time.

The SPEAKER. Is not this a conference report?

Mr. MANN. We will dispose of that now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite the action of the House on this conference report, the gentleman from Illinois had indicated that he desires some time for general debate on that side of the House, and I have suggested to him that he can take that up to-morrow; and out of that suggestion has grown his request.

The SPEAKER. All right. The request is that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table and the disposition of the rule concerning the Board of Governors of the Soldiers' Home, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] shall each have control of an hour for general debate. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] for the present consideration of the conference report on the Alaskan coal bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the conference report.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the conference report and that the report be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Oklahoma that the statement is much longer than the conference report. I think the statement would not be as clear as the report.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1186.)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows. In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to survey the lands of the United States in the Territory of Alaska known to be valuable for their deposits of coal, preference to be given first in favor of surveying lands within those areas commonly known as the Bering River, Matanuska, and Nenana coal fields, and thereafter to such areas or coal fields as lie tributary to established settlements or existing or proposed rail or water transportation lines: Provided, That such surveys shall be executed in accordance with existing laws and rules and regulations governing the survey of public lands. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000 for the purpose of making the surveys herein provided for, to continue available until expended: Provided, That any surveys heretofore made under the authority or by the approval of the Department of the Interior may be adopted and used for the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 2. That the President of the United States shall designate and reserve from use, location, sale, lease, or disposition not exceeding 5,120 acres of coal-bearing land in the Bering River field and not exceeding 7,680 acres of coal-bearing land in the Matanuska field, and not to exceed one-half of the other coal lands in Alaska: Provided, That the coal deposits in such reserved areas may be mined under the direction of the President when, in his opinion, the mining of such coal in such reserved areas, under the direction of the President, becomes necessary, by reason of an insufficient supply of coal at a reasonable price for the requirements of Government works, construction and operation of Government railroads, for the Navy, for national protection, or for relief from monopoly or oppressive conditions.

"SEC. 3. That the unreserved coal lands and coal deposits shall be divided by the Secretary of the Interior into leasing blocks or tracts of 40 acres each, or multiples thereof, and in such form as in the opinion of the Secretary will permit the most economical mining of the coal in such blocks, but in no case exceeding 2,560 acres in any one leasing block or tract; and thereafter, the Secretary shall offer such blocks or tracts and the coal, lignite, and associated minerals therein for leasing, and may award leases thereof through advertisement, competitive bidding, or such other methods as he may by general regulations adopt, to any person above the age of 21 years who is a citizen of the United States, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation or municipality organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof: Provided, That a majority of the stock of such corporation shall at all times be owned and held by citizens of the United States: And provided further, That no railroad or common carrier shall be permitted to take or acquire through lease or permit under this act any coal or coal lands in excess of such area or quantity as may be required and used solely for its own use, and such limitation of use shall be expressed in all leases or permits issued to railroads or common carriers hereunder: And provided further, That any person, association, or corporation qualified to become a lessee under this act and owning any pending claim under the public-land laws to any coal lands in Alaska may, within one year from the passage of this act, enter into an arrangement with the Secretary of the Interior by which such claim shall be fully relinquished to the United States; and if in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior the circumstances connected with such claim justify so doing the moneys paid by the claimant or claimants to the United States on account of such claim shall, by direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be returned and paid over to such person, association, or corporation as a consideration for such relinquishment.

"All claims of existing rights to any of such lands in which final proof has been submitted and which are now pending before the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior for decision shall be adjudicated within one year from the passage of this act.

"SEC. 4. That a person, association, or corporation holding a lease of coal lands under this act may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and through the same procedure and upon the same terms and conditions as in the case of an original lease under this act, secure a further or new lease covering additional lands contiguous to those embraced in the original lease, but in no event shall the total area embraced in such original and new leases exceed in the aggregate 2,560 acres.

"That upon satisfactory showing by any lessee to the Secretary of the Interior that all of the workable deposits of coal within a tract covered by his or its lease will be exhausted, worked out, or removed within three years thereafter, the Secretary of the Interior may, within his discretion, lease to such lessee an additional tract of land or coal deposits, which, including the coal area remaining in the original lease, shall not exceed 2,560 acres, through the same procedure and under the same competitive conditions as in case of an original lease.

"SEC. 5. That, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, lessees holding under leases small blocks or areas may consolidate their said leases or holdings so as to include in a single holding not to exceed 2,560 acres of contiguous lands.

"SEC. 6. That each lease shall be for such leasing block or tract of land as may be offered or applied for, not exceeding in area 2,560 acres of land, to be described by the subdivisions of the survey, and no person, association, or corporation, except as hereinafter provided, shall be permitted to take or hold any interest as a stockholder or otherwise in more than one such lease under this act, and any interest held in violation of this proviso shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General for that purpose in any court of competent jurisdiction, except that any such ownership and interest hereby forbidden which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held for two years, and not longer, after its acquisition.

"SEC. 7. That any person who shall purchase, acquire, or hold any interest in two or more such leases, except as herein provided, or who shall knowingly purchase, acquire, or hold any stock in a corporation having an interest in two or more such leases, or who shall knowingly sell or transfer to one disqualified to purchase, or except as in this act specifically provided, disqualified to acquire any such interest, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years and by a fine not exceeding $1,000: Provided, That any such ownership and interest hereby forbidden which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held two years after its acquisition and not longer, and in case of minority or other disability such time as the court may decree.

"SEC. 8. That any director, trustee, officer, or agent of any corporation holding any interest in such a lease who shall, on behalf of such corporation, act in the purchase of any interest in another lease, or who shall knowingly act on behalf of such corporation in the sale or transfer of any such interest in any lease held by such corporation to any corporation or individual holding any interest in any such a lease, except as herein provided, shall be guilty of a felony and shall be subject to imprisonment for a term of not exceeding three years and a fine of not exceeding $1,000.

"SEC. 8a. If any of the lands or deposits leased under the provisions of this act shall be subleased, trusteed, possesssed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form part of or are in anywise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, with consent of lessee, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, entered into by the lessee, or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, or control, in excess of 2,560 acres in the Territory of Alaska, the lease thereof shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings.

"SEC. 9. That for the privilege of mining and extracting and disposing of the coal in the lands covered by his lease the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as may be specified in the lease, which shall not be less than 2 cents per ton, due and payable at the end of each month succeeding that of the shipment of the coal from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the beginning of each year, on the lands covered by such lease, at the rate of 25 cents per acre for the first year thereafter, 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, and $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. Leases may be for periods of not more than 50 years each, subject to renewal, on such terms and conditions as may be authorized by law at the time of such renewal. All net profits from operation of Government mines, and all royalties and rentals under leases as herein provided, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States in a separate and distinct fund to be applied to the reimbursement of the Government of the United States on account of any expenditures made in the construction of railroads in Alaska, and the excess shall be deposited in the fund known as the Alaska Fund, established by the act of Congress of January 27, 1905, to be expended as provided in said last-mentioned act.

"SEC. 10. That in order to provide for the supply of strictly local and domestic needs for fuel the Secretary of the Interior may, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in advance, issue to any applicant qualified under section 3 of this act a limited license or permit granting the right to prospect for, mine, and dispose of coal belonging to the United States on specified tracts not to exceed 10 acres to any one person or association of persons in any one coal field for a period of not exceeding 10 years, on such conditions not inconsistent with this act as in his opinion will safeguard the public interest, without payment of royalty for the coal mined or for the land occupied: Provided, That the acquisition or holding of a lease under the preceding sections of this act shall be no bar to the acquisition, holding, or operating under the limited license in this section permitted. And the holding of such a license shall be no bar to the acquisition or holding of such a lease or interest therein.

"SEC. 11. That any lease, entry, location, occupation, or use permitted under this act shall reserve to the Government of the United States the right to grant or use such easements in, over, through, or upon the land leased, entered, located, occupied, or used as may be necessary or appropriate to the working of the same or other coal lands by or under authority of the Government and for other purposes: Provided, That said Secretary, in his discretion, in making any lease under this act, may reserve to the United States the right to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of the surface of the lands embraced within such lease under existing law or laws hereafter enacted in so far as said surface is not necessary for use by the lessee in extracting and removing the deposits of coal therein. If such reservation is made, it shall be so determined before the offering of such lease.

"That the said Secretary during the life of the lease is authorized to issue such permits for easements herein provided to be reserved, and to permit the use of such other public lands in the Territory of Alaska as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of coal washeries or other works incident to the mining or treatment of coal, which lands may be occupied and used jointly or severally by lessees or permittees, as may be determined by said Secretary.

"SEC. 12. That no lease issued under authority of this act shall be assigned or sublet except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. Each lease shall contain provisions for the purpose of insuring the exercise of reasonable diligence, skill, and care in the operation of said property, and for the safety and welfare of the miners and for the prevention of undue waste, including a restriction of the workday to not exceeding eight hours in any one day for underground workers except in cases of emergency; provisions securing the workers complete freedom of purchase, requiring the payment of wages at least twice a month in lawful money of the United States, and providing proper rules and regulations to secure fair and just weighing or measurement of the coal mined by each miner, and such other provisions as are needed for the protection of the interests of the United States, for the prevention of monopoly, and for the safeguarding of the public welfare.

"SEC. 13. That the possession of any lessee of the land or coal deposits leased under this act for all purposes involving adverse claims to the leased property shall be deemed the possession of the United States, and for such purposes the lessee shall occupy the same relation to the property leased as if operated directly by the United States.

"SEC. 14. That any such lease may be forfeited and canceled by appropriate proceeding in a court of competent jurisdiction whenever the lessee fails to comply with any provision of the lease or of general regulations promulgated under this act; and the lease may provide for the enforcement of other appropriate remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof.

"SEC. 15. That on and after the approval of this act no lands in Alaska containing deposits of coal withdrawn from entry or sale shall be disposed of or acquired in any manner except as provided in this act: Provided, That the passage of this act shall not affect any proceeding now pending in the Department of the Interior, and any such proceeding may be carried to a final determination in said department notwithstanding the passage hereof: Provided further, That no lease shall be made, under the provisions hereof, of any land, a claim for which is pending in the Department of the Interior at the date of the passage of this act, until and unless such claim is finally disposed of by the department adversely to the claimant.

"SEC. 16. That all statements, representations, or reports required, unless otherwise specified, by the Secretary of the Interior under this act shall be upon oath and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require, and any person making false oath, representation, or report shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

"SEC. 17. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe the necessary and proper rules and regulations and to do any and all things necessary to carry out and accomplish the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 18. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
WM. L. LA FOLLETTE,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. L. MYERS,
WM. H. THOMPSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

Section 1 of the bill as agreed to in conference authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to survey and lease the coal lands in Alaska, giving preference, so far as early surveys are concerned, to the three main fields, to wit, the Bering River field, the Matanuska field, and the Nenana field, appropriating $100,000 for the making of the necessary surveys preliminary to the leasing of the lands. This appropriation was not carried in the House bill, but upon investigation it was deemed necessary to be made.

Section 2 authorizes the President of the United States to make reservations for the use of the Federal Government not exceeding 5,120 acres in the Bering River field and not to exceed 7,680 acres in the Matanuska field, and limiting the reservations to be made by the Government in other fields in Alaska to an area not exceeding one-half of the coal fields. The proviso to the section authorizes the President, in the case of an emergency, or when he deems it necessary, to mine coal for the benefit of the Army and Navy or the operation of the Government railroads. It likewise gives him that authority if monopoly and oppressive conditions prevail there.

Section 3 authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to divide the coal-bearing areas into leasing blocks of 40 acres or multiples thereof, and to offer them for lease by competitive bidding or such other method as the Secretary of the Interior may provide. The second proviso of the section provides that no railroads shall be permitted to own or hold a lease other than for its own exclusive use. The third proviso of the section authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make arrangements whereby the Alaskan coal claimants may relinquish any and all rights they may have to a patent under old law, and if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, the circumstances connected with such relinquishment justify so doing, the moneys paid by the claimants shall be refunded by the Government to the claimants. This is left wholly within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and it is thought no harm can come from it and great good may be derived therefrom in cases where it may be the means of clearing up a lot of troublesome litigation that has heretofore found no adequate solution. The last proviso also directs that all claims now pending before the General Land Office and the Department of the Interior shall be adjudicated within one year from the passage of this act. This is only required when the cases have been fully submitted and are now before the department for adjudication. The Department of the Interior was consulted on this proposition, and your conferees were advised that this would give ample time to accomplish the findings required and it would in no way hazard or interfere with the administration of the coal lands in Alaska.

Section 4 is practically identical with the House provision.

Section 5 was a paragraph incorporated by the Senate, which was thought to be in the interest of good administration and was thought would accomplish development of the coal fields in Alaska. Section 17 of the bill as it emerged from conference authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to work out rules and regulations which will make the section workable.

Section 6 provides that each lease shall be for such block or tract of land as may be offered or applied for, not exceeding in area 2,560 acres of land, providing how the lease may be forfeited, except that any such ownership and interest hereby forbidden which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held for two years, and not longer, after its acquisition.

Section 7 is identical with section 7 of the House bill.

Sections 8 and 8a are antimonopoly provisions which were thought to be in the public interest. They should be considered in connection with section 6 of the House bill, which sought to deal with the same problem.

Section 9 deals with the royalties and fixes the minimum at 2 cents per ton, striking out the maximum of 5 cents per ton which was incorporated in the Senate bill. The annual acreage rental being retained in the bill as it emerged from conference is substantially the same as the House and Senate bills. The latter part of section 9 fixes the term of lease at 50 years, the House section fixing it for an indeterminate period, with power to revise the royalty every 20 years. The 50-year provision is in harmony with the water-power bill and the general leasing bill for the United States, and in any event the Secretary of the Interior has full power to incorporate a provision in the lease providing how the royalty may be readjusted, and section 17 also gives him ample power under rules and regulations to readjust the royalty.

It will be observed that the last paragraph of section 9 of the Senate bill was not carried in the House bill. It is as follows:

"All net profits from operation of Government mines, and all royalties and rentals under leases as herein provided, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States in a separate and distinct fund to be applied to the reimbursement of the Government of the United States on account of any expenditures made in the construction of railroads in Alaska, and the excess shall be deposited in the fund known as the Alaska fund, established by the act of Congress of January 27, 1905, to be expended as provided in said last-mentioned act."

It is thought by your conferees that this provision fully protects the Federal Government from the fact that it specifically recites that the revenues derived from coal leases shall be applied to the reimbursement of the Government on account of the appropriation made for the construction of railroads in Alaska. This provision is thought to be in the public interest and in harmony with the Alaskan railroad bill already passed. It will also be noted that after the railway appropriation is disposed of or offset by accruing royalties the residue, if any there be, shall be used according to the act of Congress approved January 27, 1905, providing how the receipts from Alaskan revenues shall be expended.

Section 10 of the bill as it emerged from conference corresponds with section 8 of the House bill, with a slight omission. The exact words omitted are:

"Provided, That not more than one such limited license or permit shall be issued to any single applicant hereunder."

It is thought this provision is a repetition, and therefore unnecessary. It is also capable of being fully taken care of under general regulations.

Section 11 corresponds with section 9 of the House bill and does not depart therefrom in any substantial particular.

Section 12 is identical with section 10 of the House bill.

Section 13 of the bill emerging from conference is a salutary provision which found a place both in the House and Senate bills.

Section 14 is identical with section 11 of the House bill.

Section 15 is identical with the House provision of section 15 of the House bill down to the second proviso. The second proviso of section 15 as the bill emerged from conference was incorporated in lieu of section 15 of the Senate bill, which was stricken out. Your conferees feel sure the substitution is in the public interests and one that will meet with approval of both bodies.

Section 16 of the bill emerging from conference is identical with section 12 of the House bill and identical with section 16 of the Senate bill.

Section 17 is identical with sections 17 of the House and Senate bills, respectively.

Section 18 of the bill emerging from conference merely repeals all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith. It is the thought of your conferees that this should be done.

It is the thought of your conferees, first, that the bill as it emerged from conference retains the substantial features of the House bill; second, that it is workable, and that the Secretary of the Interior can proceed to lease the lands that have heretofore been tied up for eight long years; third, that the competitive plan adopted has been retained in the bill and will enable the Secretary of the Interior to derive revenues that may be applied on the Alaskan railway appropriation; fourth, that the bill is one in the public interest, and does not forfeit or sacrifice any rights of the Federal Government to the Alaskan coal claimants; fifth, that the legislation does not do violence or injustice to the Alaskan coal claimants, but leaves them in statu quo; sixth, that the Secretary of the Interior is given ample authority to make large reserves for the benefit of the Government so that the Army and Navy may have an indeterminable fuel supply; seventh, that the appropriation carried by the bill for surveys is necessary in order that the leasing may go on and the emergency that exists in Alaska be relieved; eighth, that the legislation as it emerges from conference has left full discretion in the Secretary of the Interior to protect the public interests and at the same time leave the measure workable so the opening of Alaska may be possible and good results flow therefrom.

Respectfully submitted.

SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
WM. L. LA FOLLETTE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Oklahoma yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. What is the part in the first conference report which was left out of the second conference report?

Mr. FERRIS. There was one amendment that was put in in lieu of section 15 of the Senate bill. Section 15 of the Senate bill in a word authorized the claimants to sue the Federal Government for any injury they might have or might think they had.

Mr. MANN. Where is that in the first conference report?

Mr. FERRIS. In our first conference report in lieu of section 15 we added a proviso to section 14 of the conference report bill, which was intended to serve in lieu of section 15 of the Senate bill. The conference agreed on that and made reports to the two Houses. The Senate objected to it because they thought it sacrificed some Government rights and interests, and after quite a prolonged debate of two days voted it down and sent it back to the conference committee.

Mr. MANN. They sustained the point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. They sustained the point of order; but in effect it amounted to rejecting the whole report. In the second conference report we omitted section 15 of the Senate bill and the proviso we added to section 14.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman read the portion of section 14 in the first conference report?

Mr. FERRIS. I will. It reads as follows:

Provided, That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease and the operation of the mines and other works thereon or the title of the products thereof shall not be interfered with by the Secretary of the Interior except after an appropriate proceeding in the district court of Alaska instituted for the purpose of securing a forfeiture or termination of such lease, and such forfeiture or termination shall take effect only from the date of entry of final judgment declaring such forfeiture or termination: Provided further, That such court proceedings must be instituted within 90 days after notice to the lessee of the facts constituting such cause of action, or the same shall be forever barred.

That was the language that the controversy came up over.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, and I ask for information, that provision would have foreclosed the right of the Government to end the lease by forfeiture for failure to carry out provisions of the lease, unless certain proceedings were instituted in the Federal court within a certain time?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true; it was a limitation on the Government.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the change is perfectly satisfactory to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who was on the first conference committee.

Mr. FERRIS. I think I know the views of the gentleman from Wisconsin very well on the first conference, and I think this would be satisfactory to him, if he were here, although the last is merely a supposition.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has had no communication with the gentleman from Wisconsin as to the elimination?

Mr. FERRIS. No; I have not. I had a telegram from him on the first conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman indicate whether there are any other changes in the second conference report from that first agreed upon?

Mr. FERRIS. I shall be happy to do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice in reading the last conference report a material amendment, providing for the disposition of the funds arising from the rental and the royalty of coal lands.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true; that is a material amendment, and that was inserted in the last conference report. Does the gentleman want me to present the facts in regard to it? There are some other changes.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is an important one, and the gentleman may present it in his own order.

Mr. FERRIS. The first conference report did not contain the provision which I will read, but the last conference report does embody it. This language is inserted in the last conference report, but was omitted from the former report. It is found in section 9 of the Senate bill, beginning with the word "all":

All net profits from operation of Government mines, and all royalties and rentals under leases as herein provided, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States in a separate and distinct fund to be applied to the reimbursement of the Government of the United States on account of any expenditures made in the construction of railroads in Alaska, and the excess shall be deposited in the fund known as the Alaska fund, established by the act of Congress of January 27, 1905, to be expended as provided in said last-mentioned act.

That language passed the Senate, and the first conference committee were of the opinion that section 3 of the Alaskan railroad bill did all that was necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I recall section 3 of the Alaskan railroad bill, it provided that the funds should revert to the miscellaneous fund of the Treasury.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true. I have section 3 of the Alaskan bill, and it might be well to put it into the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. The House did not specifically oppose the disposition of these funds?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true. We leave section 3 of the Alaskan railroad bill to govern. That was the action of the House, and that was the action of the first conference report; but the action of the Senate, of course, put in this other provision, and I think the gentleman will remember that the House debated somewhat whether they would put in that provision, but finally decided to stand on the proposition of section 3 of the Alaskan railroad bill. It is only a few lines, and I will read it:

SEC. 3. That all moneys derived from the lease, sale, or disposal of any of the public lands, including town sites, in Alaska, or the coal or mineral therein contained, or the timber thereon, and the earnings of said railroad or railroads, together with the earnings of the telegraph and telephone lines constructed under this act, above maintenance charges and operating expenses, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States as other miscellaneous receipts are paid, and a separate account thereof shall be kept and annually reported to Congress.

That is the language of the Alaskan railroad bill, and, as I say, the House had intended to let that govern. However, there was some very strong insistence in the Senate that we first take the receipts from the coal and from the other revenues up there and pay for the Alaska railroad. Those Senators wanted to preserve the principle of not having the Federal Government go in and take all of the money out of the Territory after that, and after this is paid then step in and let what is known as the Alaska railway fund law apply and the receipts be disposed of in that manner then.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the Senate provision to which the House conferees agreed the second time virtually negative and nullify the provision adopted by the House in the Alaska railroad bill?

Mr. FERRIS. I really do not think it has any effect on it, only so far as coal leases are concerned. Section 3 of the Alaska railway bill applies to timber, oil, coal, mineral, and every available thing, and I think the only thing to modify it would be royalties from these leases, and our conference report does specifically say that these moneys shall all go into the Treasury until the railway appropriation is provided.

Mr. STAFFORD. And after that has been provided, then it shall go——

Mr. FERRIS. As per the Alaskan-fund law.

Mr. STAFFORD. That does not go into the Treasury?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true; it does not.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand this new provision, money coming in from the rentals and royalties first go to reimburse the Government for expenditures on the Alaskan railroad, and I apprehend, as a matter of fact, that it will be several days, at least, before those funds are entirely reimbursed.

Mr. FERRIS. That is what we feared most.

Mr. MANN. But after that this establishes a principle which never has yet been adopted by Congress, that all of the money then coming in shall be expended in the Treasury for the benefit of the Territory, although in our recent bill I believe that we provided that only one-half should eventually go to the State.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman hardly intends to say that Congress has never done this specific thing, because, as a matter of fact, we only adverted to a law, a thing that Congress did do.

Mr. MANN. I know; but we never have yet disposed of these things in this way. This is an entirely new proposition.

Mr. FERRIS. But we did authorize the sale of Alaskan coal lands at $10 an acre, and we did provide that those funds should go as the Alaskan fund provides, which, of course, is lots worse than this.

Mr. MANN. That is true enough. A certain amount of money has to be expended in Alaska, and probably this will never be excessive; but when we passed the general leasing bill we provided, first, that the funds should go into the reclamation fund, and then, when repaid by the reclamation fund, one-half, as I recall, should go to the State in lieu of taxation.

Mr. FERRIS. That is right.

Mr. MANN. This provides that in the end all of the money shall go for the benefit of the Territory. I believe the law provides how it shall be expended—schools, charity, roads, and so forth. Probably there will be time enough to change it before they reimburse the Government entirely for its expenditure on the Alaska railroad, but I doubt whether it is a good principle to adopt.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that he and I are not very far apart in our views in respect to that; but I will further say that they are mistaken who think that the pathway of the House conferees was strewn with roses. We could not have our way about all things.

Mr. MANN. That is true; and I have no desire to criticize the conferees; yet the first conference report was agreed to by the Senate conferees. It was not rejected by the Senate, except on a point of order relating to one item, and that item had been left out.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. MANN. I should have supposed that, leaving that item out for the benefit of the Senate, they would have still agreed to the other things they had formerly agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman's thoughts are traveling along the precise line they ought to travel; and I do not wonder that the gentleman says that we ought to have insisted upon that; but some of the strongest friends the bill had in the Senate said that we must preserve that principle or the bill would not go through. I think we have accomplished so much in other respects that we should be satisfied.

It will probably be 25 or 30 years, and maybe longer than that—maybe after we are all gone—before this Alaska railroad is paid for; and if we are right in that supposition, as the gentleman said, we will have plenty of time in which to correct an error, if it is an error, in that respect.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, it is not material, probably, so far as Alaska is concerned; but it is very material, in my opinion, so far as the continental part of the United States is concerned, where we have the States. We passed a House bill in reference to the general leasing of coal and oil lands, and so forth, and there we determined that in the end one-half should go to the States in lieu of taxation. This principle now adopted here is that all of the money shall go to the States, if the States are put on even terms with the Territory; and, of course, if that coal bill passes the Senate, the western Senators will again insist that all of the money shall go to the Western States where the lands are located. I think these resources belong to the General Government, and when we pay to the State a reasonable amount in lieu of taxes we have done all they ought to ask us to do.

Mr. FERRIS. In reply to that, I will say I agree with the gentleman. I agree with his course of reasoning, I agree with his line of thought, and I agree with his suggestion. I think he has hit the nail right on the head; but, at the same time, it seems to me we ought to pass this law. Congress has heretofore said that the fund should be used in a certain way in Alaska. Now we step in and interrupt that proceeding that Congress had committed itself to by the act of June 27, 1905, long before I ever came to Congress.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. I have listened with a great deal of interest to this discussion, and it struck me that the youngest man on the floor of this House, perhaps a man not yet born, who may come here as a Member of Congress, will never see a surplus arising in the direction which we are now discussing. The building of the proposed railroad in Alaska, in my judgment, will require all the funds available for the next half century.

Mr. FERRIS. That I fear; but we all hope for a more roseate view.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly indicate if there are any other changes which the conferees agreed to which were not contained in the first conference report?

Mr. FERRIS. As the House is aware, it will be remembered that the first conference report was rejected by the Senate on the theory that we had exceeded our authority, and therefore with some precision we went through the bill in order to avoid anything subject to a point of order. So in section 14 of the conference report on the bill, section 14 of the Senate bill, which corresponds to section 11 of the House bill, we left out this language:

And the lease may provide the enforcement of other appropriate remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof.

So in this conference report that language is stricken out. Now, again we made one other change. There was an arbitration provision which passed both the House and the Senate, and our conference committee in the first instance inadvertently left it out We reincorporated that the last time.

Mr. MANN. What section?

Mr. FERRIS. I will get it in just a moment. Section 11 of the House bill provided this language, among other things:

And the lease may provide for resort to appropriate methods for settlement of disputes or for remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof

The Senate bill provided:

And the lease may provide for the enforcement of other appropriate remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof.

And we incorporated in the pending conference report that same thought carried——

Mr. MANN. What section of the conference report?

Mr. FERRIS. That was in section 11 of the House bill, corresponding to section 14 of the Senate bill, which now is incorporated in section 14 of the conferees' report on the bill. Then we put in section 12 in the last conference report the words "or sublet," which we had omitted from our first conference report and the Senate had omitted.

Mr. MANN. I do not find that provision of section 14 of the conference report. Can the gentleman state what section it is in?

Mr. STAFFORD. Section 14.

Mr. FERRIS. We add that language to section 14.

Mr. MANN. I do not read it in section 14.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is just before the proviso. The clause before the proviso, section 14, is what the gentleman refers to.

Mr. FERRIS. That is it.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in that about arbitration.

Mr. FERRIS. "And the lease may provide for the enforcement of other appropriate remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof." It does not say on the face of it it means arbitration, but the conferees took the Senate provision whereby we put it within the power of the Secretary of the Interior to incorporate a provision of that kind. That is our thought. Now, unless somebody desires some time on either side——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. I desire to ask the gentleman with reference to the last section, 18. What is the thought of the committee with reference to that section?

Mr. FERRIS. Section 18?

Mr. RAKER. The repealing clause in the bill. It reads:

That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. FERRIS. This is the thought: Section 18 of the Senate bill as it passed the Senate, as the gentleman knows, is to repeal the provision with reference to irrigation, and it was the thought of the conferees that we ought not to deal with that matter on this bill, however advisable it may be. I personally would be in favor of repealing it, which could be done at any time, but we did not think we ought to put in a provision providing for the repeal of acts of Congress.

Upon the examination of the Alaskan coal lands that have been made applicable to that Territory it developed that they did not have any appraisement law at all, and the only thing that could be done up there, if this bill served as a restoration of all these lands, was to sell them at a flat $10-an-acre rate.

Mr. RAKER. This repealing division then applies solely to the laws as applying to Alaska?

Mr. FERRIS. And only so far as they are in conflict with this.

Mr. RAKER. Only so far as they are in conflict with this present bill?

Mr. FERRIS. That is all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the House would be interested in having the gentleman point out with some emphasis that the conferees did not agree to the absolute royalty basis that was inserted in the Senate for the mining of the coal, but the House conferees retained the original House provision of making it not less than 2 cents a ton.

Mr. FERRIS. I should be very glad to devote a moment to that. As the House well remembers, we had before us and considered very carefully the advisability of trying to place any maximum on the amount to be charged for coal, and the House, I think, was almost a unit on the proposition that we should not. So the House bill provided for the competitive plan of disposing of the coal, with a minimum provision of 2 cents, but no maximum, to the end that the Secretary of the Interior could use his best energies to get all he could for the coal. As the bill passed the Senate they incorporated a provision in it like this, that the minimum royalty shall be 2 cents a ton and the maximum royalty shall be 5 cents a ton. It was the very earnest thought of the House conferees that no such provision as that ought to be incorporated in the law. For instance, what shape would Congress be in, and how could Congress defend, and how could Congress reply, with even good faith, when one coal company offered 10 cents a ton and another offered 12 cents a ton, and another offered 15 cents a ton, when there was a positive prohibition in the law that the Secretary of the Interior could only charge 5 cents a ton royalty? And so the conferees were very steadfast in their opinion on that, and the Senate yielded, and that went out of the bill. So it was neither in this conference report nor in the last, and I feel sure it should not be in either one of them.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I should like about 10 minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, there are two features of this Alaskan bill that I desire to discuss briefly. One of them relates to the very important and, it seems to me, significant fact that the Alaska coal bill as it will become a law does not contain any provisions whatever for the protection of the consumer or the user of Alaskan coal, unless such protection may be secured by and through contracts or by and through stipulations in the contract entered into by the Secretary of the Interior and the lessee. It is true there are very indefinite and not very effective provisions in the bill that it might be said were intended to give some protection to the consumer of these coals. We began the discussion of this question of retaining the Alaskan coal lands in public ownership rather than passing title, on the theory that a transfer into private ownership would lead to monopoly, and that it might not be possible under such a system to fully protect the purchaser of that coal from unfair prices; from absolute refusal to sell the product to certain parties; from all of those unfair practices from which people have so frequently suffered in this country. It was said, I think, at the time the matter was under discussion in the House, and when I offered several amendments intended to regulate and control the disposition of these products, that it would all be taken care of under general laws, and there was a section 3 in the so-called antitrust bill as it passed the House, which would have punished an attempt to monopolize or unfair practices in the sale of these products, but, lo and behold, when the conferees took possession of that bill and gave it an anesthetic, and then performed a dental operation, and removed all of its teeth, section 3 evaporated into thin air, went out, and became as though it never had been.

So here we are at the end of all this talk with regard to the Alaskan coal situation just exactly where we were before, so far as any protection to the general public that may desire to purchase and use these coals is concerned. No better off in that respect than we would have been under private ownership. This is a beautiful sample of a legislative "ring around the rosy"—talk, talk, talk, discussion, loud insistence upon the protection of the public. After we get all through with it the public is just where it was before, and absolutely without any additional protection whatever. Even the protection of a general statute, which we would have had, had section 3 remained in the antitrust bill, is denied us, and these lessees can monopolize as much as an owner could have monopolized, can proceed to unfair practices just as much as an individual owner could, unless by some process not clearly understood by me the Secretary of the Interior may be able, in the form of a contract, to restrain that sort of thing. I doubt if he will ever be able to do it. So much for that.

There is another very significant feature of this Alaskan legislation. Alaska is a Territory We ought to care for her and care for her people quite as well as we care for the people in the States. We ought to guard their interests quite as much, but no more. What is fair in Alaska touching the public lands and touching the utilization of the products and the revenues from public lands ought to be fair within the confines of the States. In Alaska we give the Territory all of the proceeds of leases, every dollar of them. Some of it is to be spent in the building of railroads in Alaska, and the balance is to be utilized for the building of roads, care of the insane, education, and other purposes, as provided by the legislation creating the Alaskan fund. That is the situation in Alaska. It is a just and proper provision. It is just as it should be.

But what did we do with regard to the States of the Union, the Commonwealths of the Union, in the bill which we passed the other day? First, we repealed the sale laws, and therefore the States will not receive the 5 per cent on sales which they now receive. We repealed the provisions under which oil lands are sold and granted them free, so that the States are deprived of the 5 per cent on sales which they formerly received and the opportunity to tax the lands. Now when lands are sold they go on the tax lists, and the communities tax the lands and the properties for the purpose of building roads, maintaining schools, and paying for all the numberless expenses of a civilized and progressive government. But under the recent leasing legislation the State, while it loses the 5 per cent, while it loses the opportunity to tax these properties, does not receive a single solitary cent in lieu of that which it loses. The entire fund may be taken out of the State, beyond its boundaries hundreds and thousands of miles, and used elsewhere.

Of course there is a provision that ultimately 50 per cent of these funds, when they have been used in a reclamation project somewhere, if those dollars can be tagged so as to be identified and recognized when they return, shall be utilized for the benefit of the communities and the States; but in the meantime, in the 20 or 25 or 30 years that may intervene, what are these communities going to do? Where are they to obtain the funds for the education of their children? From what source are they to secure the money necessary for the building of roads, hundreds of miles of them, that they must build right across these lands that are owned by the Government, and from which they will receive not a sou in the way of income?

No ranker injustice than that was ever proposed or suggested in any legislative body on earth, and I can not understand how gentlemen can bring themselves to agree to deprive the Western States of their largest and most important sources of income, and then turn right around, when it comes to Alaska, and provide that Alaska shall have the benefit of every dollar of the moneys received from the leasing of their lands.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I have many dear friends on both sides of the aisle in this body and at both ends of the Capitol who feel a good deal as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] does, and they think that we are going to do them a great violence and a great injustice. The real truth about it is, however, that we do so many good things for the West that I would be almost afraid to call attention to them for fear that by so doing the legislation might be defeated. I am not going to take up the time now to tell all the good things that this bill does for the West, but I will tell a few of them.

For the last eight years every acre of land in Alaska has been withdrawn from entry, and could not be used for any purpose. This bill authorizes the surface of the land to be used and entered for homes, the same as lands in Wyoming and elsewhere in the far West. That is benefit No. 1. No. 2 provides that the railroads shall pay their honest debts, which the Alaskan railroads agreed to pay. That is No. 2; and it provides, after that, that the proceeds may be used according to the law which I presume the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] assisted in passing through this House; a law which was passed and approved on January 27, 1905. It was passed before I came here.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman should understand that I am not criticizing what he has done in the case of Alaska. On the contrary I am approving it. I am only criticizing him and his colleagues because they have not done it with the States.

Mr. FERRIS. I will say to the gentlemen over there and to the gentlemen over here that if I thought this was an injustice to the West I would not be supporting this bill, because my heart and my interest and my affections are with the West. This bill does more for you out there in the West than you realize, and you ought to approve it. It permits the surface of the land to be used and entered as homes, and to be taxed by the local communities, and it does that in the general bill. Those lands are now tied up, and can not be used for any purpose.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him one moment further?

Mr. FERRIS. I regret I can not yield.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. FERRIS. I want to proceed a moment further. I would like to yield, and I do not want to be discourteous to the gentleman, but I want to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma declines to yield.

Mr. FERRIS. Benefit No. 2: This coal is subject to taxation the moment it leaves the mouth of the mine, and your legislature can put an excise tax on the products of the mine and the States will derive that revenue.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. FERRIS. Let me go a little further.

Mr. MONDELL. Just for a question.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FERRIS. Instead of having an outrage committed upon him, the gentleman is having an apron full of apples dumped into his lap. What would the gentleman's solution of this Alaskan problem be? Would the gentleman keep Alaska tied up for eight years more? Would the gentleman say that the coal land there should be sold at $10 per acre, according to the existing law? Would the gentleman say that Secretary Lane ought to restore those lands to entry and let the scandal and riot and trouble arise in Alaska again? I know he would not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman does not want to misstate my position, I am sure. I voted for the gentleman's bill. I propose to vote for the conference report.

Mr. FERRIS. I am not at all nettled by the gentleman's remarks. I am really very glad to hear from him. But the gentleman is particularly caustic in his attacks, in his savage attacks, on this legislation. My service and the service of my colleagues of the Committee on the Public Lands has been an unselfish one from A to Z. What does any member of the committee on the Democratic side, and what does any member of the committee on the Republican side, and what does the Progressive member of the committee profit by working a year, almost, in getting through some legislation that will actually open up Alaska?

I call the attention of my Democratic colleagues to the fact that there is no one here who would want this Congress to adjourn, after making a $35,000,000 appropriation for railroads in Alaska, and still leave the coal lands up there tied up. Is there any gentleman over here on this side or over there on that side who would like to enlist under the banner of the gentleman from Wyoming, whose party's program for Alaska looks to no opening up of that vast region? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Eight long years since the lands were withdrawn have elapsed, and you can not now get enough coal even to put in a stove for fire as the result of the program of the gentleman's party. I freely give the gentleman from Wyoming the credit of bringing into this House a bill four years ago—I think it was four years ago——

Mr. MONDELL. Three years ago——

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; and I joined with him in trying to get some relief for Alaska. We followed his plan then. I voted with him in his efforts to give relief to Alaska. The gentleman was then chairman of the committee and I was a private on the committee. I threw no obstacle in his way. I stood side by side and shoulder to shoulder with him and tried to get that bill through. What happened? The House virtually rolled us up in a ball and tossed us unceremoniously out of the window. We did not get enough votes to know that we were even in the running. What happened? Myself and the 20 patriotic members of my committee joined hands and said, "We will try to pass a bill that will walk hand in hand with Judge Houston's bill, the Alaskan railroad appropriation bill." What did we do? We brought it in here. The House considered it. Republicans helped with it. Democrats helped with it. Everybody helped with it except the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. It went to the Senate. Nearly everybody helped with it there. It passed the Senate; it passed the conference. They did not even have a roll call on it when it passed the House. They did not even have a roll call on it when it passed the Senate. Everybody was for it but the gentleman from Wyoming. I do not want to say this, but I can not help but make an observation a little bit personal.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman should not say it, because he knows that that is not an accurate statement of the facts.

Mr. FERRIS. I will pause for the gentleman to tell wherein I falsify.

Mr. MONDELL. In the first place, I announced at the beginning of the debate that I was going to vote for the gentleman's bill, and I did vote for it.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; but——

Mr. MONDELL. But that did not prevent my calling attention to its faults, to those things in which it failed to do the things you claimed you wanted to do.

Mr. FERRIS. Just a moment further. Yes; and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD makes comment more eloquent than the gentleman from Wyoming can ever make, when it shows that the gentleman threw every possible obstacle he could in the way of the bill. He offered dozens of amendments, some of them consisting of entire bills, some of them consisting of sections of old, discarded, bankrupt bills of his own. He was for it. He was like the man walking one way and looking the other. He was offering obstructive tactics from one end of the bill to the other, and still saying he was for it. Let me make the observation I intended to make a moment ago. It may be a little personal or it may not. I may be in error and I may not; but when I look at the Speaker of this House I call attention to the fact that he used to be a prominent member of the Ways and Means Committee, and I find him helping that committee, pushing and helping to make that committee successful.

I look on the Republican side and I find the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who used to be chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. I find him helping and aiding that committee, trying to make it successful. I find the Speaker trying to make the committee to which he formerly belonged successful. I find the gentleman from Illinois trying to make the committee to which he formerly belonged successful. I find him offering every aid to Judge ADAMSON in his committee; and fond as I may be of my friend from Wyoming, and much as I cherish his opinion, I find him rather lagging in his tent, rather pulling back on his halter, instead of rising to the statesmanship and patriotism that the Speaker does and that the gentleman from Illinois does. I find the gentleman from Wyoming retarding the bill, pulling back instead of pressing forward, and throwing obstacles in our way. I did not intend to say this. I want to say to the gentleman now that any way I can render a little aid, any way I can render a little service toward the development of the West, where every cent and every interest I have on earth is located, I shall do it; and if the fortunes of politics should sweep us from our feet and again sweep the gentleman into power, I will be at his back trying to help him accomplish good things for the West. The gentleman does not know how it sounds when he comes in here and utters weird, fantastic statements that do not even hold together. They are not what he intends to say.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to give me five minutes. He has seen fit to attack me. I think I am entitled to a little time.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield the gentleman five minutes. I hope he will not take much more time, because I do not want to get into a colloquy with the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. It is no argument; it is no answer; it never was since time began and it never will be until all things end, to reply to an argument with personal criticism. The gentleman has not referred to or answered the just and proper criticisms I have made of the bill. Now, I like the gentleman from Oklahoma. He and I have worked together here for years, and generally in harmony. He was against the Alaskan railroad bill and so was I, but he criticizes me because I opposed some features of this bill. Is he not subject to the same criticism for opposing as vigorously as he did the bill brought in by his party for the building of an Alaskan railroad? It is no answer to my criticism to say that I have been vigorously and continuously opposed to certain features of the bill. I have not been an obstructionist on this bill. I offered amendments that, in my opinion, would have helped the bill, some of which were adopted. I offered amendments that were intended to protect the purchasers of these products; they were rejected. There is not a line or a syllable in the bill that affords such protection. It does not answer my argument to say that I have been opposed to some of the provisions of the bill. I shall vote for the conference report as I voted for the bill, but I vote for it fully realizing its faults and determined to point them out. I fully realize what the bill lacks, but I am anxious to do something to help open the coal of Alaska to use. I am always glad to join with the gentleman from Oklahoma, and in the main he and I have been in agreement; but he must not criticize me because I object to things that in my opinion, whatever may be his opinion, are subject to criticism.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] have three minutes—not on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can yield time.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from New York does not want to speak on the bill.

Mr. GOULDEN. It affects the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may have three minutes—not on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps what I have here may throw oil on the troubled waters between the two distinguished gentlemen from the West, both of whom are my personal friends. Therefore I ask the indulgence of the House to read it. It is entitled "Out Where the West Begins." It has been my privilege to have traveled over this country extensively, and having a great many friends in the West, of whom I am very fond, and as the subject before the House deals with that section, I think it deserves a place in the records of Congress about this time. The poem, the author being unknown to me, is entitled:

OUT WHERE THE WEST BEGINS.

Out where the hand clasps a little stronger,
Out where the smile dwells a little longer—
That's where the West begins.

Out where the sun's a little brighter,
Where the snow that falls is a trifle whiter,
Where the bonds of home are a wee bit tighter—
That's where the West begins.

Out where the skies are a trifle bluer,
Out where friendship's a little truer,
Out where everything is newer—
That's where the West begins.

Out where a fresher breeze is blowing,
Where there's laughter in every streamlet flowing,
Where there's more of reaping and less of sowing—
That's where the West begins.

Out where the West is in the making,
Where fewer hearts with despair are aching,
Where there's more of giving and less of taking—
That's where the West begins.

Where there's more of singing and less of sighing,
Where there's more of giving and less of buying,
And a man makes friends without half trying—
That's where the West begins.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FERRIS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER SATURDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that a number of Members desire to leave the city on Saturday, some of whom have to return to their homes to register. The program of the House is about completed, except when the revenue bill comes back. I have no desire to keep Members here, and I know that it is necessary for them to be in their districts at this time. All I have to ask is that when the revenue bill does come back Members will furnish a quorum to expedite that measure, and I would like to first ask that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Monday is unanimous-consent day, and I think it is advisable that we do not adjourn over that day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REPEAL OF HOUSE RESOLUTION 601.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 649.

Resolved, That House resolution 601 directing the Sergeant at Arms to enforce section 40 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offered that resolution as the proponent of the original resolution. It was necessary when the original resolution was passed to maintain a quorum in the House. At the present time business is not pressing, and I believe the membership of the House are willing to respond when the revenue bill comes back. In the meantime there may be some days in which the Members can go to their districts, and I do not think they ought to be penalized when they return to their constituency with an election just coming on.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if the adoption of this resolution contemplates the repeal of that statute?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it does not; it could not.

Mr. HENRY. I would like to see the statute repealed, and if there is any way to get up a bill to repeal it I would like to see it done. I do not want to embarrass the resolution presented by the gentleman from Alabama, but I would like to have such a bill considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. I think possibly if the distinguished gentleman from Texas, chairman of the Committee on Rules, would report a rule for immediate consideration of such a repealing bill that the rule would pass.

Mr. HENRY. Personally, committing myself to the proposition now, I would like to see the statute repealed to-day. I am ready to do it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say this: So far as the statute is concerned, I think this House should have control of its Members, but I do not believe that there ought to be a final repeal of the statute entirely. I think the statute works too great a hardship. I think it ought to be amended so as to only invoke the penalty against a Member when he is absent without leave of the House. That would give the House the right to grant leave to any Member that had a good excuse and yet exercise the power of the House to bring the man back.

Mr. HENRY. I do not want to embarrass the gentleman from Alabama, but I would like to say that it may be necessary next week to have a quorum on some other matters beside the war-revenue measure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that so far as I am concerned when there is business before the House I shall exercise all the power I have to furnish a quorum, but I do not want to embarrass Members at this time.

Mr. HENRY. I do not want to sit here silent and let Members think that there may not be any necessity for a quorum early next week.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman give us any idea about when the revenue bill may come to the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not; it depends on the debate in the Senate. I do not think it will get back to the House before the middle of next week.

Mr. RAKER. Take my case. It takes me five or six days to get home. Suppose I start home, and next week you are without a quorum and an order for arrest is issued, would I be arrested and brought back?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman would be if the Sergeant at Arms could catch him; but if the gentleman was a day ahead he could not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from California that I do not see that the order would very much relieve his situation, being so far away from home; but it will relieve a number of gentlemen who are only 24 or 36 hours away.

Mr. RAKER. I want to put my case plainly. I am going to have it fixed now, because it is very important to me. The rule, I suppose, should be applied to all, and it would be the duty of the Sergeant at Arms to serve his warrant of arrest, and it would be my duty to come back from California in order to preserve a quorum?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I realize that, in justice to this House, many Members probably ought to go to their districts before the election. I have recently told Members on this side of the House that I thought they were at liberty to go home, with the understanding that if necessary to make a quorum those who were near enough should come back when this side of the House asked them to. As far as I am concerned, under the circumstances, while I may not be in favor of the proposition before the House, I would do everything I could to have Republicans enough present to make their share of a quorum so that the House might transact its business.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman if he thinks it will be possible to secure a quorum within 24 hours after it may be necessary to have one here?

Mr. MANN. I can not say whether it would be 24 hours or 48 hours, but I think it is quite possible to secure a quorum within a very short time.

Mr. HENRY. I want to be fair about it. The gentleman understands that I am in hopes that we can have legislation on the cotton situation.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman. I hope we will have legislation to relieve the cotton situation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if the Members from the far West, who have been here all of the time, who did not even go home during the interim between the conclusion of the regular session and the beginning of the extra session—that is, between the 4th of March and the 7th of April—about 20 of us, who have helped make a quorum here for a year and a half, could not be excused now and be permitted to go home and not required to come back to make a quorum during the rest of the session?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman would take my advice on the subject, I would advise him to go home and not to pay any attention to any request the Sergeant at Arms might make to him. The Sergeant at Arms may not be permitted to make a discrimination, but the gentleman from the far West will not be needed to come back to make a quorum before the election, because we can get a quorum otherwise.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama when he thinks Congress may finally adjourn?

Mr. MANN. When will the European war end? [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As far as I can tell, I do not think the revenue bill will be back to the House before the middle of next week. If it comes back by Wednesday, I do not believe it will be possible to adjourn before Saturday week.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman really thinks it may be Saturday week before we adjourn?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think it can be before then.

Mr. HENRY. If he does, then I have nothing further to say.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think we can adjourn before that time.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Is it the general consent of the House after this is through that I may be excused from attendance on the House during the rest of the session?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. That might be the gentleman's view, but I know he does not mean it. My Republican friend can not get rid of me that easy.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think we ought to have the presence of the gentleman from California as much as possible during his limited stay here.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say that I have been attending to my duty for months, when the gentleman who made the remark about my being excused has been away for months.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from California has been here so long that it is getting on his nerves.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman from Alabama have any doubts about the ability of the House to get a quorum here without a great deal of trouble in the event this resolution is repealed at this time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no doubts about it. If I thought there were any doubts about the Members coming back to furnish a quorum to pass the revenue bill I would not ask for this repeal, and I will say further to the gentleman that if they do not come back I shall offer another resolution proposing the same thing as I did before, but I think they will come back.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. Will this repeal have any effect on reimbursing those Members whose salaries have been docked under the power of the resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. CRISP. Personally I would like to see them reimbursed. It does not affect me.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the repealing of this resolution have a retroactive effect so as to save former absentees?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose it would for this month.

Mr. BRYAN. Does not the gentleman think that this is an unheard of and preposterous statute, which can be suspended at will, put up or down, according to the will of the majority?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the gentleman about that.

Mr. BRYAN. It is a preposterous proceeding that a statute may be a law when we want it and not a law when we do not want it. It seems to me a serious thing to suspend the enforcement of a law, if it is in truth a law.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlema.. yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BARTON. Before the resolution is passed I want to know if the passage of it relieves the Sergeant at Arms from making a deduction that the former resolution called for?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would so far as this month is concerned.

Mr. MANN. It leaves it to the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; and I have no doubt that he will use wise discretion.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman stated that he thought the law ought to be amended so that leave of the House would be a valid excuse.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. A great many Members were absent under leave of the House when the resolution was passed on August 25, and they immediately returned, but pending the time for them to reach here by the usual and most rapid method of travel they were absent a day or two.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I do not think now is a very auspicious time to hold a post mortem.

Mr. PADGETT. Would the gentleman object to an amendment to his resolution to provide that it should be operative from August 25 last?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, I do not think that would do now.

Mr. MANN. That would not have any effect. I would further suggest to the Members of the House that the repeal of this resolution will not deprive any Member of the House of the right to make a certificate to the Sergeant at Arms that he was absent, in accordance with the provision of that section of the law, and is not entitled to his pay for the time that he has been absent. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I call for a division. I will not vote to suspend the enforcement of a law. We put it on with a roll call; now let us put it off with a roll call.

Mr. BUTLER. Do not let us do anything of the kind; let us all get away from here.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I call for a division, and I am going to vote no.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 81, noes 8.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FERRIS. If this House passes a resolution at this time to the effect that the sense of this House was that the Sergeant at Arms should reimburse the salaries to the Members who have lost them, would he be compelled to do it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would take a joint resolution to do it.

Mr. FERRIS. It ought to be done.

The SPEAKER. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. [Cries of "Regular order!"] Under the rule, this being Calendar Wednesday, the House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that my request that when we adjourn on Friday we adjourn to meet on Monday is agreed to?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the conclusion of the speeches of Mr. MANN and Mr. UNDERWOOD, I be given 30 minutes to make an address to the House on rural credits, especially to discuss two bills, one framed by the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency and the report made by the United States commission, confining my remarks to those two bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the hour granted to the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Illinois each has been concluded, he shall be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes on the subject of rural credits, the speech to be confined to that subject. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. Is the gentleman's request merely to make an addresss?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I be excused from further attendance on the House for the next three weeks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that he be excused from attendance on the House for three weeks. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY—REVISION AND CODIFICATION OF PRINTING LAWS.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 15902, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15902, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15902) to amend, revise, and codify the laws relating to public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 69. PAR. 2. The Joint Committee on Printing shall have control of the arrangement and style of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and while providing that it shall be substantially a verbatim report of the proceedings of Congress shall take all needed action for the reduction of unnecessary bulk, and shall provide for the publication of an index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semimonthly during the sessions of Congress and promptly at the close thereof, and for a table of contents in each issue of the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Mr Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana will remember I took up some time ago with the Joint Committee on Printing the question of whether it would be possible to have the index to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD kept up to date so that you could find something, that index being now semimonthly, and that is what is appropriated for here.

Mr. BARNHART. I did not get the gentleman's question.

Mr. MANN. I think we print the index now every two weeks, but this says semimonthly. But is it not every two weeks?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; every two weeks.

Mr. MANN. We print the index to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD every two weeks with a table of contents, and if you want to know whether a thing passed last summer, April, May, or June, you can not find it without looking through all the indexes for that period unless you are lucky enough to strike it the first time. But if you want to know whether a certain thing has been done during this session of Congress, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD index furnishes very little information unless you sift through all the indexes. We have now had a session of Congress running nine months. When I took up this matter with the Joint Committee on Printing some time ago I asked what figures they could give, and they gave very large figures for keeping the index current like it is when the final index is finished. I do not know if there is any way of doing that without great expense, but to gentlemen who have occasion now to look up legislation that has taken place at this session of Congress the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD index is of very little value unless you know about the date.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is the index as prepared now paid for on the item basis?

Mr. MANN. I do not know how it is paid for.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. My impression is it must be.

Mr. MANN. I think not.

Mr. BARNHART. It is paid for on the page basis.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In a long session like this that is equivalent to a good bonus during this Congress.

Mr. MANN. Why?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If in the last Congress payment to the indexer was a very considerable sum, this session it will be far in excess over the other—a very handsome profit, indeed, and a sum of money probably to justify an index in daily form.

Mr. MANN. I think the expense referred to by the Committee on Printing when I took the matter up was not the expense of making the index, but the expense of printing and paper. I am sorry I have not the letter here.

Mr. BARNHART. I have the letter. Would the gentleman like to have it read?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. It says:

The cost of printing 30,000 copies of the Index and the History of Bills and Resolutions in the present form, as it is now printed, is $29,348.20.

The cost of printing 30,000 copies of accumulative Index and History of Bills and Resolutions, complete every two weeks, would be $181,123.40.

The cost of printing the same number of copies of accumulative Index without the History of Bills and Resolutions every two weeks would be $120,930.60.

The cost of printing 575 copies of a cumulative Index and History of Bills and Resolutions every two weeks for congressional use and 29,425 copies of Index and History of bills and Resolutions in the present form for subscribers would be $90,825.79.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does that include the editing?

Mr. BARNHART. No. It would not cost any more for editing. The same editorial force would likely do the work.

Mr. MANN. I think this is largely for paper.

Mr. BARNHART. Paper and resetting type. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the information of the committee is that it would require resetting continually, and the printing, binding, and so forth, additional.

Mr. MANN. I do not know why it would require any large amount of resetting——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Of course it would require a change in the forms, and perhaps that would require more or less resetting to bring it down to date. Of course I do not think it would be worth while to go to the expense of $100,000 extra to have the index. Probably it would not be necessary if you had an index and sent it out to all the subscribers; but there ought to be some way by which Members of Congress can keep track of what has been done at this session of Congress. You can go and get the Index for the last session of Congress—and that is complete—and look up the RECORD, but if you want to find what has been done at this session of Congress you can not do it without a large amount of labor, looking through a whole lot of semiweekly or semimonthly indexes. I do not know as there is any way to do it otherwise. Perhaps I make more use of it than most of the Members, and it would be cheaper to give me an extra clerk—which I am not going to ask for—to have matters looked up. But the present method is a very unsatisfactory one where you have a long session of Congress.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARNHART. The committee fully realizes all that the gentleman from Illinois has said.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. BARNHART. We have gone into it from every possible angle, and there seems to be no other way, and so far as the increased cost is concerned, I might say the difficulty about that is that there are so many corrections that it virtually means resetting the entire index every time it is changed, and it must be changed, as a matter of course, in order to keep it up to date. Now, all the committee has is the estimate and the word of the Public Printer and those who have had charge of this work for all of these years. We asked them to give us an intelligent plan by which this might be changed, and they said there was no plan except the one suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, and the cost of that was so colossal that the committee decided it would not recommend it.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the committee that the cost that was presented seemed larger than the value of the additional work, unless it could be printed in only a small number; that is, if the principal cost was paper. But possibly that is not the case—it might be resetting—but so that there might be some index by Members of Congress, at least. I thought possibly we could just add a line and insert.

Mr. BARNHART. They say not. They say it means resetting continuousy, practically, and that is what makes the cost so high. That and the paper make the cost. The composition is quite expensive.

Mr. MANN. There are several things that the Congress can do which would very greatly expedite the work of Members in looking up things. Of course, you do not have anything to do with the indexing of the proceedings of the House. The index of the House, after the Senate bill as passed the House, does not show in the House index at all. And the man that has to look up something, as many of us have to do constantly, to see whether a bill has passed the House or not, finds it is almost impossible to do it unless you have a clear recollection. My memory is fairly good about legislative proceedings, and yet frequently I have to have somebody spend half a day to find something.

Mr. BARNHART. So far as the perscnal experience of the chairman of the committee is concerned, he learned after he had been here two or three years and worn his gray matter to a frazzle in trying to find things by the index, that about the shortest cut to it was to go to the document room and get somebody with a good recollection to give him information offhand. It is a complex situation, and it seems there ought to be some way to have it remedied, but how?

Mr. MANN. I frequently go to the document room for information, and about as frequently they come to me for information.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I believe that by the introduction of an amendment at the end of line 21, making it read "on a plan to be devised by the Public Printer," an indexing plan can devised, the cost of which need not exceed the pay of two men at $3,500 a year.

The index of bills passed can be devised and carried on and the RECORD can be indexed daily. The simply indexing of the daily RECORD can be done every night when the copy for the RECORD is cut out and assigned by indexing the RECORD in four sections—one for the Senate, and one for the House, and one for bills, and one for resolutions. Section 3 will cover bills and section 4 speeches, and a little calendar can be carried on the top, if the Public Printer is so requested, without any additional cost except that of a sheet of white paper—a sufficient index to enable Members of Congress and others to pick out the things in which they are particularly interested.

The matter of indexing has become an expert science. There are several large schools in the United States which teach library and other indexing, and I am satisfied, if the chairman will accept the amendment which I shall offer, giving the Public Printer the authority to devise that plan, that it can be carried out with little additional expense. I offer an amendment at the end of line 21, on page 90, to strike out the——

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, we have passed the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that he read down to page 91.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We are providing now for the daily indexing, are we not?

Mr. BARNHART. That is in section 69, paragraph 2, that we are now discussing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will withdraw my amendment, then, for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 69. PAR. 4. No matter that is not germane to the business before either House, except such as shall be spoken in order, shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless specifically authorized by the respective House after having been referred to and reported upon by its Committee on Printing: Provided, That either House may grant a Member leave to print or extend his remarks in the RECORD upon a stated subject, but the matter so printed shall be germane to such subject and shall not, unless otherwise authorized, exceed four pages of the RECORD in length: Provided further, That no address or speech not delivered in either House, and no book, pamphlet, newspaper or magazine article, or document, except reports of committees, shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless read in order in either House or authorized by it after having been referred to and reported upon by its Committee on Printing.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Here is a change in the practice of the House, proposed by this bill, which is revolutionary. There are now on the floor of the House 16 Members of the House; maybe 17. If this paragraph goes into the law and is observed, the four hundred-odd Members who are not present now will have all kinds of cat fits when they learn about it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Tell us about it now, so that we can have a little fit right at present. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. It will render my friend from Washington more anxious than ever to address the House [laughter], which he always does with grace and value to the House. But there are many Members of the House who insert speeches in the RECORD by permission. This morning by unanimous consent we authorized the insertion of a political speech made by the Speaker a few days ago. It is done every day. But under the provisions of this paragraph no extensions can be made or leaves to insert speeches can be granted unless they are not to exceed four pages in length and are germane to some particular subject when the request is asked for. You could not insert the speech of the Speaker; you could not insert a letter of the President; you could not insert anything unless the Committee on Printing had reported it into the House.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. Is not what is provided here substantially and theoretically, at least, what is the practice in the United States Senate to-day?

Mr. MANN. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. The Senate of the United States, while it does not follow our practice about extension of remarks theoretically, in fact, it does in many cases, and there is more extraneous matter inserted in the RECORD in the Senate than there is in the House.

Mr. FINLEY. Well, now, just there, is not that usually stated to be, and as a matter of fact is, the production of some one else, and they state that they will insert it?

Mr. MANN. Well, that is very apt to be the case; yes.

Mr. FINLEY. What I had allusion to is this, that unless a matter is actually spoken in the Senate it is presumed not to go into the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I believe that is the presumption, though it is a somewhat violent presumption; but the situation here is entirely different. The House has 435 Members. We bring in a rule here for the consideration of a bill. Under the rules of the House the Member who obtains the floor in general debate is entitled to an hour's time. We know that we can not give 435 hours to the consideration of a bill in the House, and the rule authorizes, and very often by unanimous consent the House authorizes, general leave to print.

Mr. FINLEY. Just there, Mr. Chairman; on page 91, section 69, paragraph 4, it is provided that either House may grant a Member leave to print or extend his remarks in the RECORD upon a stated subject, but the matter so printed shall be germane to such subject and shall not, unless otherwise authorized, exceed four pages of the RECORD in length—not upon the subject of debate, but the subject that he mentions.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but the general debate in the House is not confined in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to the bill pending before the House. You do not seek to change that rule of the House, but a Member who obtains leave to extend his remarks must state the subject and must confine himself to the subject; and under this it is the duty of the Public Printer to read his remarks and see if he does confine himself to the subject, and if not, not print them. Of course the Public Printer will not do that and nobody expects him to do it.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. I am constrained to think that the gentleman from Illinois has not examined that as carefully as he might.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not think that the gentleman from Illinois has not considered that carefully. I examine all these matters carefully, and I have examined this one carefully.

Mr. BARNHART. No doubt, from the statement that the gentleman makes, he feels that he is right, but he does not take into consideration lines 20 and 21 on page 91, and he does not take into consideration the provisions beginning on line 23 of page 91, because that language is as plain as words can make it that—"except such as shall be spoken in order" no matter "shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless specifically authorized by the respective House."

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; but the gentleman did not read the rest of it. Read the rest of it.

Mr. BARNHART. I read:

After having been referred to and reported upon by its Committee on Printing.

Mr. MANN. That was what I was talking about.

Mr. BARNHART. It is the matter that is not germane that he is referring to, not the spoken matter.

Mr. MANN. Of course words spoken in the House are not affected by this. The gentleman said I had not read the paragraph. It was the gentleman who had not recently read the paragraph. I said you could not put anything in here, practically, without having the Committee on Printing pass upon it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Under the provisions of that paragraph, could the letters that the President is going to write, commending these various gentlemen for their performance, be put in the RECORD?

Mr. MANN. Not unless they were read in the debate in the House or the Committee on Printing reported favorably on it and the House should pass an order permitting it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then I am against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARNHART. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FINLEY. I will supplement the answer of the gentleman from Illinois by saying it could not be done unless the House granted leave.

Mr. MANN. No; but the House can not grant leave for such a thing without referring it to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GOULDEN. If the gentleman will yield, I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the four-page limit is a most commendable and wise provision to be placed in the bill? I have never heard the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] make a speech of sufficient length to cover more than four pages of the RECORD, and I think most of the men whose speeches are read and have any influence on the country at large never exceed that, because I think no one has the time to read a speech that covers 10 or 15 pages of the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I made a speech on the pure-food bill that cost me $1,000 to print, which was much longer than that, and much of it consisted of extracts which by permission were inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. GOULDEN. I hope the Lord will forgive the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Now, my understanding is that that could not be done under this bill.

Mr. FINLEY. Those extracts that the gentleman had printed were germane, were they not?

Mr. MANN. I think they were.

Mr. FINLEY. Does not the gentleman think that would come under this provision?

Mr. MANN. Not if they exceed four pages in length.

Mr. FINLEY. My view is that permission for the insertion of matter in the RECORD will go on much as it has gone on before.

Mr. MANN. I expect so. Why? Because the Public Printer will not undertake to carry out the law, and the result of it will be that Members of the House who are conscientious in their endeavor to obey the law will not print these speeches in the RECORD, and those who do not care whether they obey the law or not will print them in the RECORD. That happens now, sometimes.

Mr. FINLEY. That is an abuse which is practiced at times, is it not?

Mr. MANN. It is an abuse that you are going to encourage the practice of.

Mr. FINLEY. The purpose is to stop abuses to some extent.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I did not even say that I criticized the provision in the bill. I think it would be very unfortunate for the House to pass a proposition of this sort without anybody calling attention to what it means. Here is an entirely revolutionary proceeding in the House. A few moments ago, as I stated, there were 17 Members on the floor of the House. I do not propose to make the point of no quorum, because I do not wish to delay the consideration of the bill, and I do not propose to make a motion to strike this out, although I doubt whether it will ever become a law, and I am sure that if it does it will raise as much trouble as the docking resolution which we repealed this afternoon. It is impossible for all the Members of the House who wish to put their views in the RECORD to obtain the floor to make their speeches in the House itself, or to obtain permission under the provisions of this bill to insert speeches. Now, I have reached that stage in the proceedings of the House where I make too many speeches, where usually I get the floor without great difficulty, and where I seldom extend remarks. But I tell you that you can not enforce the provisions of this paragraph with the old Members of the House who have acted differently or with the new Members of the House who have no other opportunity to get into the RECORD. Refer it to the Committee on Printing! Well, I shall be sorry for the chairman of the Committee on Printing if this ever gets to be a law.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman from Illinois, I am very sorry that there are not more Members here to participate in the consideration of this important question; but, notwithstanding, I would like to call attention to a few features of the abuses under the present privilege of RECORD printing, that have grown to such proportions that, it seems to me, they ought to be corrected by some form of legislation. I understand that no enactment can be effective that may not inflict some hardship. And yet, Mr. Chairman, after years of deliberation, first by one committee and then another, we have reached the conclusion that there ought to be some method by which the privilege of padding the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to such an extent that it is a joke throughout the country ought to be curtailed. I want to call attention to a few specific instances, and I am not going to be partisan about this matter, and I am not going to mention names, because it is just as bad on this side of the House as it is on the other side, and I do not know but in one or two instances the big scandal that might have been precipitated if the newspapers of the country had known it would have fallen upon the Democratic side of the House. With due regard to his vast learning, the committee probably knows as much about this question as the gentleman from Illinois, and that is not any reflection on him. It is no extravagant self-praise of the committee to say it has been over these things studiously, and I want to call attention first to the provisions of the bill as we believe it should be, beginning with line 18, on page 91. I want to get this into the RECORD:

SEC. 69. PAR. 4. No matter that is not germane to the business before either House, except such as shall be spoken in order, shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless specifically authorized by the respective House after having been referred to and reported upon by its Committee on Printing.

That means that Dick, Tom, and Harry will not be permitted hereafter to jump up and offer all sorts of material for CONGRESSIONAL RECORD purposes, which has no place therein whatever.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. BARNHART. I hope I will not be interrupted until I have finished this, and then I will answer any question. This bill provides that—either House may grant a Member leave to print or extend his remarks in the RECORD upon a stated subject—just as we do now; we always require mention of the subject on which he is going to extend his remarks—

but the matter so printed shall be germane to such subject and shall not, unless otherwise authorized, exceed four pages of the RECORD in length: Provided further, That no address or speech not delivered in either House, and no book, pamphlet, newspaper or magazine article, or document, except reports of committees, shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless read in order in either House or authorized by it after having been referred to and reported upon by its Committee on Printing.

Mr. Chairman, the committee believes that this will effectually safeguard the recklessness with which matters not germane to questions in hand nor to any subject of legitimate consideration by the House are thrown into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I want to give you a few instances. Under leave to extend remarks during the tariff debate not long ago a Member of the House inserted as a part of a general speech six bills not relating to the tariff introduced by himself, filling four pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and then added another page of his biography from the Congressional Directory.

Under leave to extend remarks during the currency debate a Member put in the RECORD a description of his European trip as printed in the Washington Post, discussing the cost of the trip, his seasickness, the cathedrals that he saw, and details of the complexity of foreign languages which he encountered.

Mr. BUTLER. Did he publish his photograph with it?

Mr. BARNHART. He probably would have if he could have got it in. The gentleman also published some correspondence with a Senator, and, under leave to extend his remarks, inserted it the next day after Congress adjourned, in which he bitterly assailed the Senator, contrary to all rules of either House.

Another gentleman, a Member of this House, under leave to print in the RECORD, put in a speech delivered by a former member of the President's Cabinet at a funeral of a celebrated brewer of the United States, thus adding advertising publicity to a certain brand of goods a like product of which made a certain city famous.

This same gentleman, under leave to extend remarks, inserted in the RECORD the index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the first and second sessions of the Sixty-second Congress relating to himself, here and there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARNHART. Another Member of this House, under leave to print, extended his remarks, inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the official proceedings of the third biennial meeting of the National Democratic League of Clubs, with an extended list of the contributors and expenditures, filling, in all, 20 pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It costs $31.05 a page, running cost of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to publish it. So that it cost over $600 to insert these 20 pages of folderol about a Democratic league of clubs that originated and was kept afloat by a certain gentleman whose name I will not mention, largely for the purpose of providing himself with a job. What has become of the league I do not know, but I know it was an outrage for anyone to insert in the RECORD that stuff, not because it was any reflection upon the party, but because it had no business in the RECORD.

Another gentleman inserted in the RECORD, under leave to extend remarks, the constitution of the Women's National Democratic League. Another, under leave to extend remarks, inserted in the RECORD 30 pages of the official review of the Chicago convention contest, a memorable occasion, in which our friends the enemy broke up and had more or less of an extensive row. It had no place in the RECORD any more than the report of the Democratic League of Clubs.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARNHART. I will in a moment, after I have finished this. In another instance a Member of Congress, not at this end of the Capitol, inserted an article entitled "The Mission of Woman," and this article was afterwards expunged from the RECORD by order of the Senate and then reprinted in it after the serious objectionable parts had been taken out. The article was written 40 years ago, and said of the women of the North:

They would fain enter the lists of pothouse politicians and become the rivals of negroes. Let them, O fair daughters of the South, pursue their own course. But if they will unsex their souls, let them at the same time lay aside their modest apparel.

Another abuse not so very long ago was when there was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an allegorical cow that to my certain knowledge was 25 years old, because it had been published in a newspaper away back as far as the days of Coin Harvey. And yet in the recent past a cartoon of that sort, without consent of the Joint Committee on Printing, was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. If it had been first submitted, under the provisions of this bill, it never would have been put in the RECORD, and thus caused the merited criticism of newspapers throughout the country.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That was not chargeable to this body, was it?

Mr. BARNHART. No; it was not; and yet it got into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The general public does not discriminate as to who authorizes it; they only see the abuse.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The point I am trying to bring out is that all the abuse of this kind is not attributable to this body, where we are given leave to extend remarks.

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, no.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Is it not a fact that these examples the gentleman has given, which I admit are outrageous, are rather the exception than the rule? The gentleman does not mean to have the country believe or infer that Members of Congress at either end of the Capitol are guilty of these extravagant practices of printing matter in the RECORD as a general thing?

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman; it is not common at all.

Mr. GOULDEN. It is not common, I am certain; but, inasmuch as this has occurred, I can not see any possible objection to forestalling such things in the future by this commendable section.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOULDEN. One thing I desire is to have the gentleman bring out the fact that the great majority of the Members are not guilty of practices of that character which the gentleman seeks to stop by the provision in this bill, because the newspapers are very apt to poke a good deal of fun at the Members of Congress, and when they do it justly I accept my share of the criticism; but I do not want to fall under the ban that the provision of this bill seeks, as I think very properly, to remedy.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I think, in reply to that, it is safe to say that the abuse of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not general. On the other hand, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD ordinarily costs about $1,000,000 per Congress, and in these two years just about to pass it will cost pretty nearly twice that amount. The committee has kept not very careful, but general, oversight over what has been inserted, and a very great amount of this increased expense is due to the insertion of articles in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that have nothing whatever to do with the proceedings of Congress. For instance, just within the past few days there have been two requests granted for unanimous consent to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the speech of an ex-President of the United States—a lengthy speech. I hold in my hand here a special issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, an abuse to which I called attention at the time that it was published. My recollection is that the cost of this one speech—not a speech, but the result of the unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD—was $13,860.

Mr. GOULDEN. That is, one issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that purpose, covering 363 pages, and costing over $13,000. This certainly should be corrected.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes. It was a special issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the express purpose of complying with the request, granted by unanimous consent, of a distinguished gentleman to extend his remarks in the RECORD. If the proposed law had been in effect that sort of voluminous publication would not have been permitted, even if the committee had reported it favorably.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The case to which the gentleman has just referred is another case where the responsibility was not upon the House, is it not?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes. That was done under the rules and law governing another body; but this bill is drafted to regulate both branches of Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I understand that; but we have enough sins of our own to answer for without conveying the impression that we are responsible for somebody else, and I hope the gentleman will make that clear.

Mr. BARNHART. I tried to make that clear, and I think if the gentleman will read my remarks in the opening he will see that this is intended to cover the action of both branches of Congress, and he will see that I read down the list and told what had occurred in this branch, and then I went on with what had occurred in the other branch of Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I probably did not hear the gentleman when he made that skip.

Mr. BARNHART. I hope I make myself clear now.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I find that this special issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to which the gentleman from Indiana has just referred consists of 360 pages. It is all one gentleman's speech.

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, that is not a speech, but just matter that he had inserted into the RECORD under leave to extend his remarks.

Mr. GOULDEN. I have never read it, and I suppose nobody else ever did.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if the great majority of the abuses of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD do not come under the head of leave to print?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. There were 30,000 copies of this particular special issue printed and distributed, and a large majority of them would go through the mail.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Assuming now that it costs from 6 to 7 cents a pound to go through the mail, there would be all that cost in addition to the Government Printing Office cost, which is between thirteen and fourteen thousand dollars.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; that is true. The cost of printing alone was $13,860.

Mr. FINLEY. And the postal cost is in addition to that?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I would like now to be permitted to conclude this statement. I want to call attention to another matter, and that is this: In the not distant past there has come to the committee a request to publish a political campaign book—and I do not care whether it is the Democratic campaign book or the Republican campaign book or the Progressive campaign book or what not—I doubt the propriety, after we have given everybody leave to extend their remarks and discuss all of the political topics under the sun, of authorizing the publication of a campaign textbook in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, because the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is supposed to be and was originally intended to be a record of the actual proceedings of Congress. These instances that I have cited are few. Many, many more, though probably not so grave, could be found, and yet no doubt reference to the RECORD would show others that exceed these in gravity. The committee has undertaken to formulate a plan to prevent this. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says that the work of the chairman of the committee will be most hazardous and laborious. The committee realizes this, and I believe the gentleman from Illinois will agree to it in a measure that when the membership of the House, that part of it which has been given to extravagant use of the RECORD in printing all sorts of magazine and newspaper articles and speeches, foreign to anything that could possibly pertain to Congress, understands that the particular matter they desire to be printed under extension of remarks must be offered in the House and then referred to the Committee on Printing and reported back to the House and submitted to the House for its approval, they will hesitate a long time before they will offer that sort of junk.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

Mr. BARNHART. I think I said that I would yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman did.

Mr. BARNHART. My time has expired, unfortunately.

Mr. MANN. That is all right. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether he thought it was any more improper to publish the proceedings of the Republican National Convention in reference to a difficulty there than to publish the platforms of the two parties?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman asks me that question——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not want this to be taken out of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BARNHART. There is a wide difference between a declaration of national principles and a party row.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired, and the gentleman from Washington has the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the committee, will for a moment give his attention, I desire to ask him some questions for information, and I take this occasion first to congratulate the gentleman—the chairman of the committee—on the work that that committee has been doing and what it has done already. I agree largely in reference to what has been done to stop the abuses of padding the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Now, I want to ask the gentleman whether this bill, if passed in the way in which it is reported here, will cure these abuses? Now, take the one case to which the gentleman alluded a moment ago, where, in the Senate, was inserted a whole volume costing, as the gentleman said, some $13,000. Was not that inserted by permission specially given by the Senate? Could not that have occurred just the same under this bill if it became a law?

Mr. BARNHART. The two branches of Congress, as I understand, have a perfect right to conduct their affairs and control their own proceedings as they see fit, especially if it is done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I know; but I wish the gentleman——

Mr. BARNHART. I do not know but under the provision I read in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, when he said there was no way by which it could be done, where it says, "unless especially authorized," if it be specially authorized by either branch of Congress it can be done.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Now, take the document that is before the gentleman. It is my understanding that a distinguished Member of another body rose and said that he was going to read all of the stuff that went in there unless he was given permission to print it. Now, could not the same thing happen if this bill became a law? It would not stop that performance, would it?

Mr. BARNHART. No; it could not interfere with that except in so far as it would become a public document under the law.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Another matter I want to inquire about is this: I understand this limits a speech to four pages. I agree with most of the provisions, but I do not think that ought to be. Now, I will give an illustration. Suppose some Member of this House wants to discuss a question that is of particular importance in his locality. I will give the gentleman a personal illustration, because it has come to my mind, and many others have had the same experience. Say I wanted to discuss the question of Panama tolls. It is absolutely impossible for that question to be thoroughly discussed in four pages. Now, is it the purpose of the committee by this legislation not to permit a Member of Congress to print a speech of more than four pages——

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, no——

Mr. BUTLER. You can increase it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want some information.

Mr. BARNHART. Congress would have a right to authorize it. The law says "unless specially authorized," and I have no doubt that if the gentleman should arise in the House on an important question of that kind and say to the House that the remarks and statistics that he had could not be contained in four pages of the RECORD, if he asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the question which he had prepared, there would not be any objection. Members of the House are generally fair.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Can that be done under the bill without referring it to a committee?

Mr. BARNHART. Not unless otherwise authorized. If you get consent of the House it could be done, but it would prevent the superfluities I have enumerated here and it would discourage Members from asking for the insertion of all sorts of speeches and publications for the reason that they would hesitate to refer questionable matter to a committee for approval.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Following the question asked by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], it seems to me that on a proper occasion and upon a proper subject—if the gentleman will answer the question in order that I may see if I am right—after a Member has had his hour in the House in which to make a speech he might have four pages in the RECORD in which to extend his remarks. If he desires more than four pages in which to print what he did not have an opportunity to say here in the House, the opportunity may be given him by the House. This bill will not deprive him of extending his remarks beyond four pages. It simply requires him to appeal to the House for the privilege.

Mr. BARNHART. Not in that instance, because he had the right to make the speech, and he might make it 10 pages long if he got the time, and then if he asked the unanimous consent of the House to extend his remarks, rather than to take more time he could print his speech in full, no matter how many pages it would require.

Mr. BUTLER. I think this provision is a good one, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. With pleasure.

Mr. FINLEY. I have known of a few instances where a party did not obtain permission of the House to extend remarks—did not obtain recognition—and there was no general leave granted to extend remarks or insert remarks in the RECORD, and yet the speech appeared. I know of an instance several years ago where a lengthy speech occurred and the party did not even get recognition from the Chair. Now, it would be impossible under this provision of the law for that party to perform in that way.

Mr. AINEY. For the purpose of asking a brief question of the chairman of the committee——

Mr. BARNHART. Right there, will the gentleman yield? I want to add a word of explanation to what the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] has said. As a matter of explanation to the gentleman's position, there are numerous instances wherein Members have risen and asked unanimous consent for leave to extend their remarks, and have then printed two or three speeches in the RECORD under one leave.

Mr. BUTLER. I appreciate that fact, and I have been thankful many, many times that they have asked permission to print rather than to inflict their speeches upon me as one Member who is required to sit here. [Applause and laughter.] But I think there should be some restraint placed upon the opportunity which gentlemen have had. And for one minute, if the chairman will give me his attention, I wish to state that this is a useful provision, because the time is not far off when the length of hours and the length of days will not be given to this House to properly attend to the business which it is required to attend to. I will ask the gentleman whether or not he has not omitted from this paragraph a word which it should contain. First, if I understand it, it has two propositions in it: First, that no matter that is not germane to the business before either House shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and, secondly, that unless it is spoken it shall not be printed. First, it shall be germane, and, secondly, it shall be spoken. If that be so, if I am right in my view of the paragraph and its true purposes, I think you should have the word "and" in between the words "House" and "except."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] has expired.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] may have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARNHART. I will answer the question by saying it seems to me the insertion of the word "and" in there would couple the two together into one meaning.

Mr. BUTLER. Do you not intend to do it?

Mr. BARNHART. No.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not the purpose of the act, first, to make the matter which is to go in the RECORD germane, and, secondly, that it shall be spoken? Because you provide for instances in which it need not be spoken and where matter can be printed when it is not germane.

Mr. BARNHART. In general debate the matter is frequently not germane, and yet it is spoken in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not propose to be technical about it, but that is the way it impressed me.

Mr. BARNHART. We want to get it right. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. BUTLER. Any matter that is not germane to the business before either House shall not be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. No matter that is not spoken in order shall be printed. Does the gentleman catch the point I am endeavoring to make? It seems to me by reading it and by looking at the paragraph that the committee intended that first of all the matter spoken in the House should be germane to the business of the House.

Mr. BARNHART. I think if the gentleman will examine it carefully he will find that it would cut out general debate. It might be so construed by the insertion of the word "and" in there.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course I would not want that to occur.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] will yield, I do not think it is possible by law to control what is spoken in the House. If the House permits a man to make a speech, it is within the control of the House and not in control of a law made by the President, the Senate, and the House combined. Now, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is supposed to show what is spoken in the House. That is the purpose of this exception. While it says "in order," that is not the business of this legislation. If it is spoken in the House, it is supposed to go in the RECORD, unless it is stricken out, as it was erroneously the other day.

Mr. BUTLER. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this paragraph is, first, to limit the matter spoken in debate to germaneness or that which pertains to the business of the House.

Mr. MANN. It is matter, though, which is not spoken in the House that this has reference to. This paragraph has reference to debate that does not take place. It is theoretical and not actual.

Mr. BUTLER. All right. It seems to be all right if we can pin it down.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso in a formal way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY] is recognized.

Mr. AINEY. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether the second and third provisos may not lead to some confusion? By the first proviso leave may be granted to a Member to print and extend his remarks in the RECORD upon a stated subject by action of the House. Supposing, now, that the Member should incorporate in that speech, or desire to incorporate in that speech, a newspaper article or a reference to some book or pamphlet, would not there be some confusion because of the terms of the second proviso, which prescribes that such may not be printed without the leave of the House after reference to the committee?

Mr. BARNHART. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the second proviso sets forth that—

> No address or speech not delivered in either House, and no book, pamphlet, newspaper or magazine article, or document, except reports of committees, shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless read in order in either House or authorized by it after having been referred to and reported upon by its Committee on Printing.

Mr. AINEY. Yes; but, Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the other proviso also relates to an address not delivered in the House. Suppose a speaker proposed to incorporate in the RECORD a book or a newspaper article in order to illustrate his speech. He has leave to do so under the first proviso by securing leave of the House, but is prohibited from doing so under the second proviso other than as he may obtain from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BARNHART. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the second proviso clearly refers to the matter as a whole, whereas if a man wanted to extend his remarks and wanted to use a quotation I do not see that there could be any limitation on that. But he would be prohibited from seeking to extend his remarks in the RECORD and then inserting this publication which is allowed under the first provision.

Mr. AINEY Under this provision if anyone obtaining permission to extend remarks under the first proviso purposes to quote therein briefly from a newspaper article he can not so quote and print without obtaining a second leave under the second proviso, which requires submission to the Committee on Printing. Is that the purpose of the chairman?

Mr. BARNHART. If I have a short publication, yes; and if not, no. That is my answer. The purpose of this is to prevent a Member from doing what we frequently see done—rising and asking unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a certain article, and then the next day another Member sees an article in refutation of it, and he asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting a certain other article. The purpose of this legislation is to see to it that these matters are referred to the committees of the respective Houses and let them pass upon them. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Illinois if they do not believe that this precautionary feature of the law will prevent so much recklessness in the matter of filling the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with documents?

Mr. AINEY. I will say to the chairman of the committee that I find myself quite in accord with the purposes of this bill, but I doubt if confusion will not arise by these two provisions, one of them providing for permission to be granted by the House upon request, and the other necessitating the going to the committee with the further request if it is intended to cover a quotation from some book or newspaper which the speaker desires to incorporate in his extended remarks.

Mr. BARNHART. Just one moment. It was the intention of the committee—and I still believe that it is clear—that the second provision is simply a limitation on the first—to prevent abuse if a Member undertakes to offer an article in order, or, as we see it frequently done and as the gentleman from Pennsylvania sees it done, where a Member will write two three lines and then insert four or five pages of a book or a document.

I will say in this connection that not in this branch of Congress, but in another one, and not very long ago, a publication was given in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD relative to child labor that covered pages and pages and pages, and it was printed as a public document afterwards; and it cost the Government, according to the figures I heard last, something like $45,000. I do not suppose the man who put it in there ever read all of it, and I do not know that he will ever read all of it, and I do not know that an estimate of the printing cost was ever asked for. In that case it could be referred to the Committee on Printing, and they would take it up with the Member; and if they decided to report it favorably they could report it to the House, and the House could do with it what it saw fit. It leaves the matter in the hands of the House and not in the hands of the individual Member. That would prevent the possibility in the future of such abuses as have occurred heretofore. They could not occur under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY] if his pro forma amendment is withdrawn?

Mr. AINEY. Yes, Mr. Chairman; I ask leave to withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. Then I renew the pro forma amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois renews the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MANN. I am quite in sympathy, Mr. Chairman, with the gentleman from Indiana and the Committee on Printing in the endeavor to prevent many of the abuses that come from printing in the RECORD. I do not believe there is any Member of the House who stays on the floor of the House more than I do or who keeps closer track of the proceedings in the House than I do. I have seen gentleman after gentleman during my term of service rise and say that he was going to stop all future leaves to extend remarks. I think I heard the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] come pretty nearly making that statement.

Mr. BARNHART. That I would try to.

Mr. MANN. I know that I heard the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] make that statement. I remember distinctly hearing the distinguished leader of the Progressive Party [Mr. MURDOCK], who has not been here for a long time, make that statement here in the House. I have seen them come and go, but I never saw one yet to stick out with his resolution; and yet I am not criticizing them for yielding. Why? Everyone knows that if you insist upon nothing being printed in the RECORD except what was spoken in debate, 12 months in the year would not be long enough for windjamming in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BUTLER. One hundred months in the year would not be long enough.

Mr. MANN. I sometimes wish myself that there were more extensions and leaves to print and fewer actual speeches; and yet it would not be gracious for me to say that, because I make too many speeches.

Now, I agree with the gentleman from Indiana that something ought to be done, but I think that something ought to be done that is practical. Who is to determine about these things? Suppose the House grants leave to me to-day to extend my remarks, and this bill is in effect. Who is to determine whether what I insert is germane or not? Who is to determine whether I have put an editorial from some paper in my remarks or not? Who is going to prevent the speech being printed? My distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] both stated a while ago that they knew of cases where men had inserted speeches in the RECORD without any permission at all. How did it happen? How did the gentlemen know it? Why did they not stop it? Why did they not strike it out of the RECORD as a matter of precaution in the future?

Mr. FINLEY. I will answer for myself. I knew nothing about it until it was all in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Then it was not too late to strike it out. I am not criticizing the gentleman for not moving to strike it out. But the same thing will happen again. Who is going to determine? Shall it be the Public Printer? Why, we had an officer of the House here the other day obeying an order of the House; yet he was seriously criticized by several gentlemen on the floor who thought that the dignity of their position had been invaded. If some gentleman gets leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and the Public Printer tells him to go to, and throws his remarks in the wastebasket, there will be an explosion here like a bomb falling from an aeroplane. Who is to determine? I believe if you do something, you ought to do it so that it will work.

Now, I have heard several gentlemen tell about these leaves that have been granted in the past under which matters have been inserted which ought not to have been inserted in the RECORD. I am looking now at the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of a few days ago, and I find an article in it, practically the same thing having been published before by Members of Congress, inserted here by a member of the Committee on Printing. I am not criticizing him for inserting it, although much of the same stuff—I will not say "stuff," much of the same fine matter—has been inserted before, originally, I believe, by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] on labor propositions, and other Members have taken a pair of shears and a bottle of paste and written new speeches and inserted them in the RECORD. I am not criticizing that. What do they do it for? To send it to their constituents, so they can tell what great work has been done or has not been done by the Democratic Congress.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman asks. Who will prevent the abuses in the future? Does not the gentleman think a positive provision of law prohibiting abuses of that character would act as a deterrent?

Mr. MANN. Why, there is a positive provision of law now that forbids a man to insert in the RECORD remarks which he has not permission to insert, and yet gentlemen cite as a reason for this the fact that Members have violated the law in the other respect. Now, a law ought to be so framed that honest men can properly obey it and dishonest men can not easily evade it.

Mr. FINLEY. The purpose here is to make the law more explicit, so that every Member of Congress may know what it is and understand it and obey it. I will say, further, that I think that the disciplining of about one Member under this proposed provision of law would be enough to settle the question for a good while after that.

Mr. MANN. Oh, pshaw! Talk about Members being disciplined! I know several Members of this House who are sending out political letters under their franks in violation of law, as I read the law. You can not discipline them for it. Each man looks at these matters according to his own lights, and if he stays here, according to the lights of his constituents; but you can not provide by a law so that you can have a practice in the House of Representatives unless you have a reasonable law.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I appreciate the fact that it is utterly impossible to enact any legislation anywhere that will be strictly observed by all men; but in the House of Representatives, when we discover abuses that exist whereby there are enormous losses to the Treasury of the United States, it seems to me it is high time for the Congress to get busy on its own account and try, to the largest extent possible, to set its own house in order. Now if we know of these things existing, and we wink at them, of course the criticism of the public is going to increase. In this connection I am going to impose upon the RECORD long enough to read an extract from an editorial in the New York Press of August 26. It says:

> A well-edited report of real debate, confined to things actually said, would attract a great deal of interest. Few people read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD because of the interminable length of speeches issued on "leave to print." If Congress won't listen to these speeches, with all the added interest that comes from the personality of a statesman engaged in public debate, the public are not going to stop to read them.
> Thus the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to those who receive it, is a daily reminder of unbusinesslike methods. The Congress that shall have the force to cut out such absurdities will make more friends than it is now able to realize.

Mr. Chairman, that is in conformity with my experience and observation both as a newspaper man and a Member of the House for several years. I think I stated once before on the floor of the House that Members of Congress who send copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to newspaper offices are really considered a joke. Back in the days when we kindled fires in stoves in the early fall—and a good many of them do yet—the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as it came to the newspaper office was corded up by the devil in the office to be used as fuel. We used it to prop up the windows and to cut into wrappers, but I am safe in saying that not one CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in ten that goes into the average newspaper office of the United States is ever opened to be read, because the daily news service furnishes to these newspaper men a touch of what is being done in Congress from day to day, and they edit from their wire service or other press reports that come as the summarized proceedings of Congress, and that is all they have time to consider. I merely call attention to this to show that the growing tendency to pad the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with all sorts of extraneous matter is making the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD more and more a bore in the estimation of the reading public of the United States.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. How would the gentleman answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the person who shall determine whether the matter submitted is germane or not?

Mr. BARNHART. The bill provides a printing clerk, who shall have charge of the editing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The law regulates the Public Printer. I call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that we have a Public Printer who has some one at the Government Printing Office who exercises very vigilant scrutiny over what comes down there for printing.

Mr. MOORE. For one I am very glad of that.

Mr. BARNHART. For instance, within the last few days some copy for a book was sent down there by a House committee. The bulk of it was a so-called public document which was not a public document at all, but a personal testimonial, and it was refused by the Public Printer, who referred it back to the Committee on Printing and said that he would not print it under the law authorizing the printing and binding for committees unless it was O. K'd by the Committee on Printing. The Committee on Printing refused to O. K. it and the document will not be printed, because it is not a public document. It would cost something like $500 to print and bind it for the benefit of a very few. If they want to have it printed and pay for it, that is their privilege, and I hope they will have it done; but the people ought not to be expected to pay for these things, and the renewed regulations and the more stringent rules adopted from time to time by the Joint Committee on Printing and the Printing Committees of the two Houses are eliminating more and more of unwarranted printing; and if you give the committee an authorization of law to take a step further and exercise some control over the superfluous matter that is inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD we believe it will have a like helpful effect.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. With what the gentleman from Indiana has said in the matter of striking out superfluous material and matter that is not germane, I heartily agree. I think the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would be heightened in interest and value if it were severely cut. There is too much in it for an ordinary Member of Congress to read, let alone the ordinary citizen. I question whether authority is given to anyone in section 68 or the preceding sections to exercise any control over the matter submitted by Members of Congress which might not be germane. The Committee on Printing is itself given authority in section 68 to oversee addresses "not delivered in the House, books, pamphlets, magazines, articles," and so forth, and I suppose they would go to the Committee on Printing and the committee would exercise some authority. As to leave-to-print speeches, apparently that would not be submitted to the Committee on Printing, and it is not the duty of anyone to supervise them, except this "competent person" mentioned in section 69, paragraph 3.

Now, it is patent to all who read the RECORD, and I am one who tries to follow it, that matter not germane very frequently creeps in under leave to print. That is an abuse. Another abuse is the insertion in the daily proceedings of the House of matter under leave to print that has no bearing on the proceedings of the House. That would give rise to the criticism of the paper which the gentleman from Indiana quoted a little while ago. But reverting to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Illinois, just how are you going to check that up? I would like to see it done. I would support the gentleman from Indiana and his committee in any movement to edit the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, boil it down, or summarize it. But is anyone given authority to do that here? Would it be possible to create an editorship and have the copy viséed, as in a newspaper office; have it blue penciled? I do not know that we want to give anyone authority to blue pencil our copy, but I think some one should have authority, like the Committee on Printing, to see that this extraneous matter that does not appear to be germane shall not be inserted in an improper place, and that personal and political matter shall not appear as a part of the proceedings of Congress. Such matters ought to be scrutinized.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman understands that the Government Printing Office has a corps of copy readers?

Mr. MOORE. Yes; but with no editorial authority.

Mr. BARNHART. No; but when a speech came in under leave to print they would be expected to look it over, and they would look it over, as the other matter was looked over to which I referred; if questionable, referred to the Committee on Printing, and then it would be for the Committee on Printing to decide whether or not it ought to go in. I want to say in this connection that if the Committee on Printing had had charge of the RECORD in the not very distant past some things would not be in the RECORD that have appeared, because it was a great abuse.

Mr. MOORE. I recall, and I have no doubt the gentleman recalls, an instance in which not very long ago a speech was inserted under leave to print, which nobody in the House had an opportunity to see or scrutinize, reflecting very severely on certain citizens who had no opportunity to respond. These citizens had no chance to be heard as to the accusations therein made. We might call it a scurrilous speech. The speech went into the private affairs of private citizens, dragged them into the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where none of us wanted to see them and where the only purpose attained was scandal. Some one ought to have observed that and called it to the attention of the Committee on Printing. Some one ought to have authority to know that it could not go in until it was O. K'd.

Mr. BARNHART. Nobody under the existing law has any authority to do anything of that kind now.

Mr. MOORE. Who has the authority under this bill to do that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARNHART. I will say in reply to the gentleman that it is the bounden duty of the Public Printer to observe the law regulating public printing and binding, and when this law takes effect he will be bound, through his assistants, to see when leave-to-print speeches come to him whether they are in order. If there is a question in his mind, he will do what he does now in the instance I have cited, refer them to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman and his committee are doing a splendid work in codifying the printing laws, and I would like to support him. But let us see if this is the proviso on which the gentleman relies, page 92, line 3:

Provided, further, That no address or speech not delivered in either House, and no book, pamphlet, newspaper or magazine article, or document, except reports of committees, shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless read in order in either House or authorized by it after having been referred to and reported upon by its Committee on Printing.

Is that the proviso on which the gentleman places his faith?

Mr. BARNHART. That is the proviso, if there is a request to insert a book as a whole, without any reference to remarks.

Mr. MOORE. Wherein is the check to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. BARNHART. Under the general provision governing the Public Printer or superintendent of documents, wherein, if the Public Printer, the superintendent of documents, or any other officer or employee of the Government Printing Office shall permit or knowingly be party to any evasion or violation of this act, whereby the Government shall suffer any loss or damage therefrom, he shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Mr. MOORE. Where is that?

Mr. BARNHART. Beginning on page 76. We have long since passed it. It fixes a fine of $5,000, and with that penalty over the Printer he will be careful to see that the law regulating the extension of remarks is carefully enforced so far as he is concerned. If there arise a question in his mind as to the admissibility of matter, he will refuse it and refer it to the Committee on Printing of the respective House by which the leave was granted.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman is satisfied in his own mind that he has put a proper check in the Government Printing Office where the copy must go?

Mr. BARNHART. It is about as strong, it seems to the committee, as it could possibly be made. We exact from the Public Printer a stricter observation of the law governing him than ever before, because we propose to fine him $5,000 if he does not observe the law. That is one thing we did not have before. We expect under the provisions of this bill that the Public Printer will more carefully scrutinize what is to be done in his office at the suggestion of Members of Congress than ever before.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee one or two questions. It is the purpose of this paragraph to prohibit in the future the insertion in the RECORD of matter that is not germane, unless it is spoken here on the floor. Will not all material have to go somewhere before it is published in the RECORD? Will not this paragraph require the submission of all material to some one in authority?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. And the one in authority will determine whether or not it is germane?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I think that is about as strong as the gentleman can make it by indirection. He might, perhaps, provide for an editor and provide that nothing shall be published until the editor has approved it; but the proposed law is that nothing shall be published in the RECORD that is not germane unless it is spoken here. If it is not germane, it has to go back to the Committee on Printing for privilege. Will the question of germaneness be entirely within the province of the Member printing? I think not. It seems to me that there is some one provided for here. It is certainly the intention of the bill that this material shall all be submitted to some one.

Mr. BARNHART. It shall be submitted to the Public Printer.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly; and if he has any doubt about it——

Mr. BARNHART. The Public Printer is under penalty to see that the law is enforced.

Mr. BUTLER. If he has any doubt about it, it goes back to the Committee on Printing, and that will determine it.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. BUTLER. I think that is perhaps as strong as we can make it, unless we provide for an editor.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. The provision on page 92 provides that no speech not delivered in either House shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, unless read in order in either House. If it is not delivered in the House, how is it going to be read in order in the House? I do not understand that. The idea of getting leave to print is that it shall not be read in order, but shall be inserted under the leave to print.

Mr. BARNHART. This does not refer to a speech of a Member at all, and yet if a Member should secure time to deliver an address, and he saw fit to read the remarks of some one else, he could read any sort of a speech into the RECORD that the House would permit.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I refer to a very common practice in the House. I get leave to extend my remarks upon some given subject. I do not actually deliver that speech in the House. I extend my remarks, but as I understand this proviso, a speech which under those circumstances would not be delivered, can not be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless it has been read in order in the House.

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman will refer to line 8, on page 92, he will find this language:

Or authorized by it after having been referred to and reported upon by its Committee on Printing.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I want to ask about that alternative also. Of course if it is not delivered in the House, it can not be read in the House. Must I take that speech before it is printed down to the Committee on Printing and get its O. K. before it can be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BARNHART. Is the gentleman asking me?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman will refer to the beginning of the paragraph, in line 23, on page 91, he will find this proviso:

Provided, That either House may grant a Member leave to print or extend his remarks in the RECORD upon a stated subject, but the matter so printed shall be germane to such subject and shall not, unless otherwise authorized, exceed four pages of the RECORD in length.

The next provision follows and places a limitation upon that by providing:

Provided further, That no address or speech not delivered in either House, and no book, pamphlet, newspaper or magazine article, or document, except reports of committees, shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless read in order in either House or authorized by it after having been referred to and reported upon by its Committee on Printing.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Is this to be the form of procedure? If I get leave to print and then do not read that speech in order in the House——

Mr. BARNHART. Not a speech. This does not refer to a speech. It has reference to a printed address, book, or something of that kind.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not know about that. It says no speech not delivered in either House.

Mr. BARNHART. That means an address delivered outside by some one else who is not a Member of the House.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If this is what is referred to, it calls for some amendment, because as it is written, it is broad enough to include every situation that I have presented in the questions that I have asked the Chairman.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. If the language here refers only to Members of the House, it would not be in the bill at all, would it?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not understand.

Mr. FESS. The bill says no address or speech not delivered in either House. If the address is delivered by some one who is not a Member of the House, it could not have been delivered in the House, and it must refer to some one else, not a Member of the House.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Why? If I get leave to print, I do not deliver the speech in the House.

Mr. BUTLER. That might be by a Member himself outside of the House.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That may be, but it can also refer to a Member who gets leave to print a speech in the RECORD.

Mr. FESS. Suppose the gentleman were to deliver a speech at Richmond, which is not delivered here?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I understand perfectly well that this language controls that situation, but it also specifically applies to a case in which a Member secures leave to print. When a Member obtains leave to print he does not deliver that speech in the House, nor does he read it in order in the House. He puts it in the RECORD. This language is broad enough to cover precisely that situation, and I ask the chairman of the committee if he intends by this language that after a Member secures leave to print from the House he must go before the Committee on Printing and secure their O. K. before his speech can be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is the situation that I am presenting, and it is one of interest to all the Members. If the language used is intended to refer to speeches other than those of a Member under the leave to print, then this language should be in some wise amended. In its present form it is too broad and limits the rights of the Members to an extent possibly not contemplated by the committee.

Mr. BARNHART. Would not the objection be cured by inserting a comma after the word "speech," in line 4. I think that would put it more clearly.

Mr. MOORE. Would the gentleman object to having stricken out, line 7, after "unless read in order in either House or authorized by it after having been referred to and reported upon by its Committee on Printing," and insert "shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless permission shall have first been obtained in either House"?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That would be satisfactory. The amendment can be made in that connection or in the connection above. I think the gentleman's suggestion would entirely meet the situation.

Mr. MOORE. It is surely confusing as it is printed.

Mr. BARNHART. I am not sure but by that change it would put us back exactly where we now are.

Mr. SAUNDERS. No——

Mr. BARNHART. That is exactly what you have now.

Mr. MOORE. If this is clear, the only new thing you have is to obtain permission of the Committee on Printing, which is the new feature.

Mr. BARNHART. The new feature in this provision, as the committee tried to fix it, is this: When reprint matter is offered, when a Member rises and asks for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of an editorial or even a speech delivered by some man in the gentleman's State of Texas, for instance, it is intended to limit that, and I referred to several instances in my remarks a while ago where speeches have been inserted in the RECORD which by no stretch of the imagination or consistency can have any place therein. Now, when a Member rises and asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks, and states what it is, under the provision here it would then have to be referred to the Committee on Printing, and if they decide that it would be all right they report favorably.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What the gentleman desires to do is to impede the insertion of matter not actually a part of the debate on the floor of the House?

Mr. BARNHART. That is certainly our intention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And it is a very good intention, too.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I will say to my friend from Texas that I am in hearty accord with the idea of correcting abuses, but I must say that this language, unless in some wise it is limited, is broad enough to bring about a resulting annoyance to the Members without accomplishing any useful result. Suppose that this bill should be enacted into law and a Member should secure leave to print. He will not deliver that speech in the House, nor will he read it in order in the House. Hence under the present language, before the Member can avail himself of his leave to print and publish his speech in the RECORD, he must go before the Committee on Printing and have them make a report. After the leave to print has been obtained a Member should not be required to secure further leave from the Committee on Printing. Hence I say that is a matter of interest to every Member of the House.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say in reply to the gentleman that I rather think that that course would have to be resorted to.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Does the gentleman think we ought to do that? Does he think that every time a Member of this House secures leave to extend his remarks he must submit those remarks to the Committee on Printing and obtain a favorable report from that committee before his speech can be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman it will have a tendency to stop this flood of useless nonpolitical matter; and if so, I think it would be a pretty good thing.

Mr. SAUNDERS. This language would not stop that at all. It would merely put the Members to an additional and vexatious trouble.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That will stop it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. No; because when I obtain leave to print I apprehend that the Committee on Printing would hesitate to put a veto upon a permit derived from the House. The Member would be reasonably certain to secure a favorable report. But having secured from the House the necessary authority to print his remarks, he ought not to be required to apply to a committee of the House for a ratification of that power.

Mr. SLAYDEN. There must be some approval to pass on the subject of germaneness.

Mr. SAUNDERS. In this connection?

Mr. MOORE. In reference to the question of germaneness, that seems to me to be covered by the preceding proviso. If the gentleman will read that, he will find that it must be germane. The only question is as to the authority to determine——

Mr. SAUNDERS. He first secures the authority. I wish to have the attention of the committee fixed on the meaning of the language used. He first, I say, secures the authority to extend his remarks. Thereafter, in conformity to that authority, he writes his speech for publication. Under the language under consideration he must then take this speech before the Committee on Printing and secure a report authorizing its publication before it can be printed in the RECORD. This, I say, a Member should not be required to do.

Mr. MOORE. Get the consent of the committee? I do not so understand. I understand the committee says it is not, but all of the gentlemen who have been following this know it makes possible that procedure.

Mr. BARNHART. Such is not the intention of the committee at all if a Member had authority to extend his remarks. Now, on page 92, line 4, after the word "speech," strike out "not delivered in either House" and insert "by other than the person requesting leave to insert the same."

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is all right.

Mr. BARNHART. That would protect it. I send the amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That will make it doubly clear.

Mr. MOORE. That is just as to outside matter not originating with the Member?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 92, line 4, after the word "speech" in line 4, strike out the words "not delivered in either House" and insert "by other than the person requesting leave to insert the same."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I see the difficulty that gentlemen desire to obviate, but one of the greatest abuses in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, if it is abuse at all—and I do not express an opinion about that—is if a Member of the House goes away from here and makes a political speech or some other kind of a speech he comes back and asks leave to insert it in the RECORD. This amendment permits that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Suppose that is made to read in this way, namely, by striking out the words "not delivered." What was the proposed amendment? Does it say "delivered by some person other than a Member of the House"?

Mr. FESS. Other than the person making the request.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I like the idea of declining to print speeches not made on the floor of the House. My idea is that the RECORD ought to be made a record of the proceedings here and nothing more.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants to carry it out, all he has to do is to sit in the House and object. If a Member asks unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD, that could be objected to.

Mr. SLAYDEN. This is trying to obviate the disagreeable necessity of doing that. Does not the gentleman from Illinois think that the RECORD would be vastly improved and a much more edifying and interesting publication if it were so confined, and would be more thoroughly read, by Members at least?

Mr. MANN. To be candid, there are times when I read speeches delivered in the House when I think the speech which is delivered is better than extraneous matter, and then there are many times when I think the extraneous matter in speeches which Members insert very much improves the speeches.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is undoubtedly true. Those things are available to any Member. He can get them without putting the expense of printing them on the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 92, line 7, after the word "unless," strike out all of lines 7, 8, and 9 and insert the words "permission shall have first been obtained in either House."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, as I stated before, that surely would result in the present practice. It would leave the door as wide open as it is now to all sorts of matter going into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It seems to me the gentleman from Pennsylvania would not consider that as any restriction on existing privileges whatever. And if that is adopted it would shear the entire provision of any possibility to regulate the matter as to preventing occasional abuse, namely, the privilege of extending remarks by throwing the bars down.

Mr. MOORE. While the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] was on his feet I asked the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] the question whether it was the purpose to have these particular matters referred to the Committee on Printing, and he said it was not. And it was because of that statement I offered this amendment. It appeared to me, as it seemed to appear to the gentleman from Virginia, that it would be a matter of much circumlocution to come into the House for the privilege of extending one's remarks and inserting a speech that was worthy of printing and then have to go to the Committee on Printing to obtain its assent. There should be some responsibility on the Committee on Printing to require information at the time the request is made as to whether the matter was germane or not or whether it was proper to print.

Mr. BARNHART. With the gentleman's permission, if the committee has not been able to classify the difference between these two provisions it is because of lack of ability to do so, because the purpose of it was to make them perfectly distinct and clear, inasmuch as the second was to be a limitation on the first. If it is the opinion of the committee that it does place any censorship over the extension of actual remarks of a Member, it should not do so except if some Member would get permission to extend his remarks and then indulge in a diatribe like the gentleman from Pennsylvania referred to, and it would be up to the Public Printer to refer it to the committee as to whether or not such matter would be germane.

Mr. MOORE. Now, let me put a case in point. I would like the attention of the chairman of the committee in order to see if we understand each other. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] makes a speech down at Richmond on good roads, and it is deemed worthy by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania rises to ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the address made by his colleague, Judge SAUNDERS, of Virginia, at Richmond, on the subject referred to, and the consent of the House is granted. Under this paragraph, as we have it, it would appear that that address of Judge SAUNDERS would have to be read in either House, or authorized by it, after having been referred to and reported upon by its Committee on Printing. That is to say, if I had sought to have the address of the gentleman from Virginia printed, it being a matter which seemed to be proper and worthy to be printed, I would first have to go to the Committee on Printing and obtain its assent before I asked permission of the House.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say no.

Mr. MOORE. Then this language certainly is not clearly understood by some of us.

Mr. BARNHART. It would be offered to the House and referred to the Committee on Printing, and O. K'd by the Committee on Printing, and passed as a privileged resolution, as other matters are passed on report from the Committee on Printing; and I am sure no Committee on Printing would undertake to eliminate from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech of the kind referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. On the other hand, it would have authority to eliminate such a speech as the gentleman referred to as having assailed the character of a private individual who had no means of equally public reply.

Mr. MOORE. I would stop that. Then after the unanimous consent was given, could it be printed?

Mr. BARNHART. It would go to the committee and be acted upon and a reprint ordered.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman's understanding is that after I had obtained the consent of the House to print the speech of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] then I would have to go to the Committee on Printing and obtain its consent. This seems an unnecessary hardship on the Member.

Mr. BARNHART. I will say to the gentleman that when the gentleman got unanimous consent to insert the speech in the RECORD the Speaker would refer it to the Committee on Printing, just as other requests are referred here in the matter of the printing of documents. It would go to the Committee on Printing and be reported back to the House favorably or unfavorably.

Mr. MOORE. That would necessitate delay, and it might not all be done in the same day.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 92, line 9, after the word "Printing," insert the words "and it shall be the duty of the Public Printer to enforce the provisions of this paragraph."

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that would be a good thing to do—to make it the duty of the Public Printer to enforce the provisions of the paragraph?

Mr. BARNHART. The committee will accept it. It simply emphasizes what has already been said and makes it perfectly clear.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 12665. An act to increase the limit of cost of the public building at La Junta, Colo.

REVISION AND CODIFICATION OF PRINTING LAWS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 60. PAR. 6. The Public Printer shall furnish the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as follows and shall supply gratuitously no others in addition thereto:

To the Vice President and each Senator, 88 copies; to each Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, 60 copies, to be supplied daily as originally published or in bound form as each may order, but not to exceed five sets each shall be bound, unless specifically requested by the Vice President, Senator, Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner entitled to the same; to the Vice President and each Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner there shall be furnished 3 additional copies of the daily RECORD, 1 to be delivered at his residence, 1 at the Capitol, and 1 to be reserved by the Public Printer in unstitched form to be promptly bound in paper when each semimonthly index shall be issued; to each standing committee of Congress, 1 daily copy; to the Secretary and the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and to the Clerk and the Doorkeeper of the House, 10 copies each, in daily or bound form, and not to exceed 20 daily copies each, for office use; to the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, 10 copies in daily or bound form and not to exceed 20 daily copies, for the use of the Senate; and to the Doorkeeper of the House, 10 copies in daily or bound form, and not to exceed 30 daily copies for the use of the House of Representatives; to the President, 4 copies of the daily RECORD and 1 bound copy; to the Chief Justice, each of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the marshal and the clerk of said court, each 1 copy of the daily RECORD and 1 bound copy; to the governor of each State and Territory, 1 copy of the daily RECORD and 1 bound copy; to the official reporters of the Senate and the House, each 2 copies of the daily RECORD and 1 bound copy; to the libraries of the Senate and the House, 1 copy of the daily RECORD and not to exceed 20 bound copies each; to the superintendents of the Senate and House document rooms, each 3 copies of the daily RECORD and 1 bound copy; to the Library of Congress, not to exceed 110 copies of the daily RECORD for its own use and for distribution, through the Smithsonian Institution, to the legislative chambers of such foreign Governments as may agree to send to the United States current copies of their parliamentary record or like publications, such publications, when received, to be deposited in the Library of Congress, and not to exceed 110 copies of the bound RECORD for its own use and for international exchange; to the Librarian of Congress, 1 copy each of the daily and the bound RECORD, which he is authorized to furnish to the undersecretary of state for external affairs of Canada in exchange for a copy of the Parliamentary Hansard, which shall be deposited in the Department of State; to the Smithsonian Institution, United States National Museum, the Civil Service Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Naval Observatory, each 1 daily and 1 bound copy of the RECORD; to the Soldiers' Home in Washington, D. C., to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and each branch thereof, and to each State or Territorial home for either Federal or Confederate soldiers and sailors or for their widows and orphans, 1 copy of the daily RECORD; to the superintendent of documents, a sufficient number of copies of the daily and bound RECORD to enable him to make distribution to depository libraries; to each of the legations of the United States abroad, 1 copy of the daily RECORD, to be sent through the Secretary of State; to each foreign legation in Washington whose Government extends a like courtesy to our legations abroad, 1 copy of the daily RECORD, to be sent through the Secretary of State and furnished upon his requisition; to each newspaper correspondent whose name appears in the Congressional Directory and who makes application therefor, 1 copy of the daily RECORD and one copy of the bound RECORD, the same to be sent to his office address, or elsewhere in the city of Washington, as he may direct; to the press galleries of the Senate and the House, respectively, 2 copies each of the daily RECORD and 1 copy each of the bound RECORD; to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, at Manila, and to the Governor of Porto Rico, at San Juan, each 10 copies of the daily RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert, on page 93, line 4, after the word "residence," the words "or his office."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 93, line 4, after the word "residence," insert the words "or his office."

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman any objection to letting these daily copies be delivered at the office of a Member?

Mr. BARNHART. None whatever.

Mr. MANN. I supposed not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I notice that you provide that the Parliamentary Hansard that we get from Canada shall be deposited in the Department of State. Why should it not go to the Congressional Library? We recently passed a resolution to permit an exchange. I do not know what they want it for in the State Department. I think it ought to be in the Congressional Library.

Mr. BARNHART. The Library of Congress gets a set under existing law, and it is satisfactory to the Secretary of State. This is a provision that is comparatively new. It was passed in 1912, and the Secretary of State gets a copy and the Congressional Library a copy, and both are supplied.

Mr. MANN. Very well. When the law was passed the statement was made that we did not have an exchange with the Canadian Government at all, and this was to permit an exchange. Of course, if they get a set in the Congressional Library, that is all they want, but I am quite confident—and I would put my judgment up against that of the clerk of the committee—that when we passed that resolution two years ago we authorized this exchange. May I ask another question?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Where do the departments get their sets of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from? Where is the authorization of a set of the daily RECORD to go to each of the departments?

Mr. BARNHART. They requisition for the amount they want; it is charged to their printing allotment, and the bound set is furnished to each depository library.

Mr. MANN. The departments now, you say, when they want a set of the daily RECORD, have it charged to their printing allowance?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes. They requisition for it if they want it.

Mr. MANN. Why is it not charged to the Interstate Commerce Commission on their printing allowance, and to the United States National Museum and the Civil Service Commission on their printing allowances, and to the Naval Observatory? You provide here for the Smithsonian Institution, the National Museum, the Civil Service Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Naval Observatory. They all have printing allowances. Of course, do not understand that I am making any criticism. I am just asking for information. If they are to continue to get these, I have nothing further to say. I do not care how they get them. I asked the question because I did not find any place in here where it was provided that the RECORD should be delivered to the different departments. Of course they have to have the RECORD.

Mr. BARNHART. These departments to which the gentleman refers have not depository libraries, but the other departments do have depository libraries.

Mr. MANN. They do not, any of them, have depository libraries.

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, yes; each executive department has.

Mr. MANN. What do you mean by "depository libraries"?

Mr. BARNHART. They are given one copy of each Government publication for their libraries.

Mr. MANN. That does not include the daily RECORD. The daily RECORD is not sent to the depositories.

Mr. BARNHART. It includes the bound RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes. I am not talking about the bound RECORD. I do not care whether they get the bound RECORD or not. It may be suitable to stack up in piles. I am sure that they do not all take it.

Mr. BARNHART. The bill provides that they shall have a copy of the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Where is it? I do not say it is not there, but it is not in this section. I could not find it.

Mr. BARNHART. At the top of page 95, it is provided—

To the superintendent of documents, a sufficient number of copies of the daily and bound RECORD to enable him to make distribution to depository libraries.

Mr. MANN. The department libraries are not depository libraries in that sense. There is one in each congressional district and two at large in each State.

Mr. BARNHART. Section 64, paragraph 1, provides as follows:

The libraries of each executive department in Washington, D. C., the United States Military Academy, the United States Naval Academy, each State and Territory, the District of Columbia, the Government of the Philippine Islands at Manila, the Government of Porto Rico at San Juan, the Pan American Union, each land-grant college, the office of the superintendent of documents, the Historical Library and Museum of Alaska, the American Antiquarian Society of Worcester, Mass., and in addition thereto not to exceed one library for each congressional district and Territory and two libraries at large for each State, to be designated by the superintendent of documents under such rules and regulations as are approved by the Joint Committee on Printing, are hereby constituted depositories of Government publications, and all designations now existing shall be permanent, except as otherwise provided in this section.

Mr. MANN. I take it all back. It is under that provision that they get the daily RECORD?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend page 92, line 21, by striking out the word "sixty" and inserting the word "eighty."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 92, line 21, strike out the word "sixty" and insert the word "eighty."

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Indiana know how much that would cost? I think the demand for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is so great that we ought to increase the number allotted to each Member.

Mr. BARNHART. It would add one-third to the present cost of the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it would not add one-third to the present cost, but it would increase by one-third the number allotted to each Member.

Mr. BARNHART. The cost of the RECORD is something like $1,000,000 per Congress. Of course, that includes the Senate.

Mr. MANN. About the only increased cost for this, of course, would be for paper, ink, and printing. It would not increase the cost of composition. Now, we are going to reduce the size of the RECORD, and make it more readable, under this provision. Since I have been here I think we have doubled the allotment of RECORDS to Members. I think we used to get 29 copies apiece. Perhaps I am mistaken about that. I think there is a much greater demand for the RECORD than there used to be. The population of the Members' districts is considerably increased. I am not inclined to be extravagant, but I believe it would be a proper thing to increase the number of RECORDS allotted to us.

Mr. BARNHART. The committee went over that phase of the matter and made some inquiry among Members. As far as the chairman of the committee is concerned, he does not have demands for all his RECORDS, except where the list of names to whom RECORDS are sent is continued from term to term. Some years ago I found myself without RECORDS enough to supply the demand that kept coming in, and I adopted this method: At the opening of a session of Congress I sent a letter to each one to whom the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD had been sent by me in the previous Congress, and said that if he wanted the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD continued please to notify me at once, and if not I would consider that he did not want it continued, and I would send the copy going to him to some one else who was asking for it.

The result is that since then I find I very rarely have requests for all my CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS. I think the draft on me for this very important session of Congress is probably 51 RECORDS. It was so a few days ago. I do not recall that there have been any additional requests since. I can see how, if Members permit their old lists to stand and make no effort to ascertain whether or not the RECORD is really acceptable, they will have an increasing list. I have constituents in my district to whom I am sending the RECORD who might consider it an offense if they wrote to me and told me they wanted it stopped, that they did not care to read it, and that I might send it to some one else. But I believe that if the method I have adopted were adopted by the membership generally we would find we had an ample supply of CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS.

Mr. MANN. Ah, of course the gentleman states his own case. Each one is apt to look at it from his own viewpoint. This is my practice: I want about 8 or 10 copies of the daily RECORD delivered at my office every day for use. I do not want them promised out in advance, and they are not sent out. I make use of them regularly. At the beginning of every session——

Mr. BARNHART. Probably there is not another Member of Congress who makes use of 10 daily RECORDS in that way.

Mr. MANN. I have talked with a good many Members of Congress who do the same thing. Every few days something happens in the House and somebody wants to know about that particular thing, and you can send the RECORD and let them know about it. I am much more particular even than the gentleman from Indiana, and I have no doubt he is more particular than many. The gentleman writes and asks them if they want the RECORD. At the beginning of each session of Congress I strike most of them off the list, and if they do not write and kick they do not get it; but many of them do, and I never have been able to supply the demand for the RECORD. I do not think I have an unusual demand.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARNHART. Does the gentleman take into consideration the fact that he is one of the most conspicuous Members in the activities of Congress?

Mr. MANN. I do not think so.

Mr. BARNHART. That his name is in the newspapers every day as having led or opposed this and that legislation; that he is the leader of his party; and that what applies to him in the matter of requests for CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS by people interested in him would not apply to another man in the Congress of the United States?

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I do not think the personal equation enters into it at all.

Mr. BARNHART. I think it does.

Mr. MANN. I do not think so.

Mr. BARNHART. I will say to the gentleman that when I retire from Congress—and that is liable to happen—and if I ever ask some one for a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it will be, in a measure, to see what the gentleman from Illinois is starting on the floor of the House.

Mr. MANN. I will say this, that if the gentleman ever gets turned out of Congress and puts in his time reviewing what I have done in the House as it goes along, it will be of vastly great benefit to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARNHART. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. MANN. I am afraid he does not do it now

Mr. BARNHART. Well, I will say, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. But seriously, now, I do not often send the RECORD to people outside of my district. I have two or three times sent a RECORD to some defeated Member of Congress, but the demand for RECORDS is by people who want to use them. It is not merely for idle reading. They follow the RECORD. I find when I go home—and I read the RECORD here every day—that I not infrequently run across somebody who seems to know more about the RECORD than I do, who religiously reads it; and I think it is a good thing.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They can not do anything else then.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman asked what would be the increased cost to supply 20 additional copies of the daily RECORD to each Member. It would cost $72,500, on the basis of the present cost of the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Of course that will only be if the RECORDS are sent out.

Mr. BARNHART. If the allotment is printed, I take it there will be a good many corded up and never sent out, as now.

Mr. MANN. I think you correct that, do you not? You change that?

Mr. BARNHART. We limit it to five copies of the bound RECORD, under the present arrangement, but further than that I do not know of any change. If I have 60 copies coming to me, and some one asks me for a RECORD and I give an order for it, they will send the back numbers, and if they do not they go to the junk heap.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman had better correct that. I only have them send the RECORD from the date that the order comes in.

Mr. BARNHART. What is the gentleman going to do with the balance of the 60 RECORDS to his credit?

Mr. MANN. Those that they do not keep to be bound I have sent to my office, and I send them out as called for. That is a good practice, and I advise the gentleman to follow it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. I was interested in the discussion between the two gentlemen as to the circulation of this great daily among the people of their respective districts. I would like to know how many people subscribe and pay for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD according to the rates printed in it.

Mr. BARNHART. In the United States?

Mr. SLAYDEN. In the United States and the Philippines.

Mr. BARNHART. In the Sixtieth Congress, first session, there were 110 subscribers; in the second session of the Sixtieth Congress, 145; in the Sixty-first Congress, first session, 110. There were 95 monthly subscribers in the first session Sixty-first Congress, in addition to the 110 session subscribers. In the second session of the Sixty-first Congress there were 160 subscribers. In the six years of the Sixtieth Congress, Sixty-first Congress, and Sixty-second Congress there was a total of 638 subscribers.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That does not indicate any great demand among the people for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It does seem to me that the distribution of 60 copies by each Member ought to supply all the literature of that sort that is needed.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, probably my calls for the RECORD would not be a very good index to go by, but I have not been able to supply all of the calls that have come to me. I have 56 newspapers in my district, and I can not supply all of them.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman sends the RECORD voluntarily to them, does he not?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. When I first came to Congress I discovered, and I presume it is the experience of others, as the man whom I succeeded was of the opposite political faith, and there never had been one of my political faith representing that district, the people were anxious to see what their Representative was going to do, and I had demands for more RECORDS than I had copies to supply. But this demand has been growing less ever since, and it may be on account of their disappointment in their Member of Congress, on account of his lack of activity. But from time to time, and I take it it is the experience of a good many Members that their constituents become satisfied with their floor work and do not care to read about it any more.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he had the same experience in sending copies to newspapers that a gentleman from another State had, whose name I shall not mention. He had a great many weekly papers to whom he sent the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD until he found that they were wrapping the mail in them.

Mr. FESS. I have not had that experience, but I am frank to say I do not know whether this distribution I have made to the newspapers is a valuable one or not. I supposed that it was. On the other hand, I am also sending one copy to each college, and I have eight colleges in my district. Then I try to send one to each separate high-school library. I do not have enough to go around. Probably if I took the time to analyze the list I might reduce them; but I frankly state to you that the allotment as now allowed does not permit me to give to all these general institutions, and therefore I have not been able to respond to individuals at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio my own experience in the matter of the distribution of the RECORD. When I came here I did precisely what he says he has done. I did not send the RECORD to all newspapers in my district because there were not enough RECORDS to go around. In the next campaign I went into the offices of the newspapers, and they were frank to tell me that they did not read the news as old as that brought by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but they used them as wrappers for their own papers. I dropped those particular journals the next session and took up a new list, and found the same experience there. Then I adopted the plan of sending it to people who asked for it, and I have found that the only part of my constituency which takes a persistent interest in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are the farmers living without quick access to the newspapers, and not the people in the towns and at colleges. They are the men who live in the remote rural country. I fancy they are the only people who are interested. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I have used all of the gentleman's time, I ask that it be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute more.

Mr. FESS. I want to confess that I have not been able to furnish any RECORDS to the farmers. Probably I have made a wrong distribution; I do not know. I would hesitate to vote for the increase in the expense, as the gentleman has stated, but at the same time I would like to have a larger allotment if it is not too much of a strain.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, at the end of line 15, page 93, by striking out the word "thirty" and inserting the word "fifty."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 93, line 15, strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "fifty."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I understand the present allotment of copies for daily use for the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives is 50. Am I correctly informed?

Mr. BARNHART. No such information has come to the committee.

Mr. MOORE. I find that 50 copies are daily assigned to the Doorkeeper, and if we were to fix 30, as proposed here, there would be a reduction of 20 copies.

Mr. BARNHART. The present law is 30, and if any official of the House is receiving 50, and the law authorizes him only to have 30, the committee knows nothing about that method of procedure. There has been no request to the committee for any increase. The bill has been submitted to all of the officers of the House. I do not know that they have read it, but there has been no request of that sort to the committee.

Mr. MOORE. I wish to say to the gentleman and to the committee that frequent requests are made for copies of the RECORD by Members of the House. It may be true that the gentleman's constituents are not always interested in the RECORD, and it may be true that the constituents of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] are not always interested in the RECORD, but there are other Members——

Mr. BARNHART. I am not clear on the gentleman's position. These 50 are issued to the Doorkeeper of the House. What use has he for them?

Mr. MOORE. I am informed that 50 copies are left here each morning for the use of the Members of the House on the floor.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. And I am quite sure of my own knowledge that there are times when the supply of daily RECORDS for the use of the Members is very quickly exhausted. We may want to read one of our own speeches, unlike the constituents of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], who spoke a moment ago. If nobody else is interested in our speeches, it is true that sometimes we are ourselves and like to look them up.

Mr. BARNHART. One is supplied for each Member of the House every morning.

Mr. MOORE. That is true, but frequently demands are made here by Members during the day in excess of the 50. This question arose, because 15 minutes ago I had occasion to ask for a copy of the RECORD which contained a speech made during the war-tax discussion, and I was informed that the supply was exhausted. I believe the date was September 25. The Clerk said to me he hoped that I was not going to ask for the RECORD of September 25 because there had been a heavy demand for that and all recent requests had been turned down. They had no more of them. I got another copy of another date, which served as well, and that is what brings this matter to my attention now.

Mr. BARNHART. That is one particular instance, but does the gentleman from Pennsylvania believe that these allotments ought to be increased generally to cover such instances?

Mr. MOORE. I am just informed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that he was unable to get a copy of the RECORD here which contained the war-tax speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. Naturally there is pressure and demand for these speeches at times. I have frequently had occasion to ask for copies here and have found the daily supply exhausted.

Mr. BARNHART. That is true in many other instances in Congress, but the committee tried to reach a happy medium in which all wants would be taken care of, and if we were to increase all along the line, to meet possible emergencies, the extra amount of printing that we would do would get us into the same rut that we are trying to get out of, and that is a great superfluity of documents that can not be used.

Mr. MOORE. I have in my hand now a cover of one of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS showing that 50 copies are delivered here to the Clerk of the House each day.

Mr. BARNHART. But the gentleman has been talking about the Doorkeeper and not the Clerk of the House.

Mr. MOORE. It is addressed to the Clerk of the House, care of Frank W. Collier, and it is a part of the assignment to the Doorkeeper as per this bill:

And to the Doorkeeper of the House, 10 copies in daily or bound form; and not to exceed 30 daily copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

That is a reduction of 20 copies per day.

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman will look at page 93, line 7, he will find this language, providing for a new division:

To the Secretary and the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and to the Clerk and the Doorkeeper of the House, 10 copies each, in daily or bound form, and not to exceed 20 daily copies each for office use.

Mr. MOORE. Does not that lead to confusion?

Mr. BARNHART. And further along the language to which he has just referred is clear. There is an abundance, it would seem to me. That makes 50 copies that now come here, according to the memorandum the gentleman has.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 7, noes 20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. Have we any relationship with the Parliament of England by which we get the reports of the proceedings in Parliament in exchange for our proceedings? Do we get the reports from England?

Mr. BARNHART. The Library of Congress gets the International Exchange.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 70. PAR. 1. The Public Printer shall, upon requisition of the superintendent of documents, who is hereby charged with the distribution of the Revised Statutes and Supplements thereto, print, bind, and deliver to the latter as many volumes of the Revised Statutes of the United States and the Supplements thereto as may be needed for distribution to State supreme court libraries, to United States courts not already supplied, to supply deficiencies and offices newly created, and to be sold by him under the provisions of section 58 of this act: Provided, That the superintendent of documents shall, at the beginning of the first session of each Congress, distribute to each Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner in such Congress not previously supplied one copy of the Revised Statutes of the United States and the Supplements thereto. Provided further, That no Senator, Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner during his term or terms of service shall receive more than one copy of such Revised Statutes and Supplements thereto.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 96, line 5, after the first word "to," strike out "State supreme court libraries" and insert "the library of the court of last resort of each State."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 70. YEAR. 2. After the close of each Congress the Secretary of State shall have edited and printed the Statutes at Large enacted by that Congress, and the Public Printer shall deliver to the superintendent of documents as many bound copies as may be needed to meet the following distribution: To the President of the United States, 4 copies, one of which shall be for the library of the Executive Office; to the Vice President, each Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, 1 copy; to the librarian of the Senate, for the use of Senators, not to exceed 120 copies; to the librarian of the House, for the use of Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, not to exceed 200 copies; to the Department of State, including those for the use of legations and consulates, not to exceed 380 copies; to the Treasury Department, including those for the use of officers of customs, not to exceed 300 copies; to the War Department, not to exceed 75 copies; to the Navy Department, not to exceed 75 copies; to the Department of the Interior, including those for the use of surveyors general and registers and receivers of public-land offices, not to exceed 250 copies; to the Post Office Department, not to exceed 50 copies; to the Interstate Commerce Commission, not to exceed 10 copies; to the Civil Service Commission, 4 copies; to the Department of Justice, including those for the use of the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States and the judges and the officers of the United States and Territorial courts, not to exceed 800 copies; to the Department of Agriculture, not to exceed 50 copies; to the Department of Commerce, not to exceed 300 copies; to the Department of Labor, not to exceed 50 copies; to the Smithsonian Institution, 2 copies; to the Pan American Union, 2 copies; to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, at Manila, 2 copies; to the Governor of Porto Rico, at San Juan, 2 copies; to the Government Printing Office, 2 copies; and a sufficient number of copies for distribution to the library of the court of last resort of each State.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that the Statutes at Large are to be distributed, one to each Senator, Representative, and so forth. Then, having given each Senator one, the gentleman proposes to give to the Librarian of the Senate 120 copies for the use of the Senators. I expect that is the existing law, but what is the object, if the gentleman happens to know, of this extravagant distribution of these pamphlets to the Senators? They can not have any use for them. I think the gentleman is satisfied with giving to the librarian of the House 200 copies. Of course that does not go all the way around. I do not know what the Senators will do with the extra copies of the Statutes at Large.

Mr. BARNHART. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the committee's only means of information was by calling on these different officials and inquiring if the present enactment was sufficient and if they were really needed; and in many instances numbers were changed by the officials both of the House and Senate. Sometimes they increased, sometimes decreased, and we took the report of these officials that the librarians need that amount; at least they did not report to the contrary, and that is the basis of procedure on the part of the committee in fixing the amount, leaving it as I think like the present law. No, the Senate has an increase of 20 and that was on the demand of the librarian.

Mr. MANN. What do they do with them?

Mr. BARNHART. Well, I do not know, but the committee could not inquire of every official appearing before it what is done with the documents allotted to him.

Mr. MANN. Of course I know the Senate Committee on Printing always gets the chairmanship of the Joint Committee on Printing and appoints the clerk to the Committee on Printing and probably has a little more influence than the House side has. The result is that Senators get more than two copies of the Statutes at Large and Members of the House get less than two, having no more use for them than we have. My observation is that they do not examine them any more carefully than we do. But that is neither here nor there. I want to make a suggestion to the gentleman——

Mr. BARNHART. I will explain that briefly, as I want to keep the Committee on Printing clear in the estimation of the Committee of the Whole House——

Mr. MANN. I am not complaining of the committee in reference to that.

Mr. BARNHART (continuing). It is this: The librarian of the Senate said there is a constant and general demand that they might have a copy at the home office and one in Washington. Our librarian here made no such request, and when such a request is made of our committee and they say that there is a demand for it, that they want it, if we did not put it in the bill it would probably go on in the Senate anyhow, and the short cut was to put it in here.
